PREFACE

The first edition of Kokilasandeśa was published in 1972 (College Book House, Trivandrum). The present edition is a slightly revised version of the previous one to which some more materials were added. The Keralasamskrtam Publications offered to include the edition in their series and I am thankful to them for the kind gesture.

INTRODUCTION

I

SANDEŚAKĀVYAS OF KERALA

Though Vālmīki has paved the way for a species of lyrics called Sandeśakāvyas by introducing the Hanumatsandeśa in his Rāmāyaṇa, it was Kālidāsa who really established it in Indian literature by composing the Meghasandeśa. The idea of conveying messages through messengers is found in the Vedas which are considered to be the oldest among the world literature. The word "dūta" is found used in the Vedas on many occasions. The holy fire is depicted as a bearer of prayers and offerings of the priests to the gods. In the Ṛgveda there is reference to a divine bitch called Saramā sent as a messenger to Paṇis[1]. Sage Śyāvāśva, the son of Arcanas has chosen the night as a messenger to convey his love message to his beloved, the daughter of Rathavītī.[2]

This type of literature seems to have been known to the authors of Itihāsas, Purāṇas and Buddhist Jātakas. The story of Nala and Damayantī which introduces a swan as messenger is well known in the Mahābhārata. The tenth skandha of the Bhāgavata contains a host of references to messages. The cowherd damsels are made to despatch messengers like Kurarī, Cakravākī, Moon, Malayānila, Kokila, Haṁsa etc.[3]

Coming to the classical period one comes across a love message sent by a woman to her lover in the Ghaṭakarparakāvya. It was against this background that Kālidāsa blazed a new trail with his inimitable message poem where he employed a cloud as his messenger. The work was received with such an enthusiasm that attempts were made to emulate it in an all India level. As a result we have a significant branch of lyrical literature in Sanskrit. But Kerala is perhaps the only region which produced works of real merit in this field, some of them coming very near to the model in quality and form. A brief survey of the contribution of Kerala authors to the field of message poems is a rewarding experience.

(1) ŚUKASANDEŚA

By far the first and foremost among the Sandeśakāvyas of Kerala is the Śukasandeśa of Lakṣmīdāsa.[4] It is a unique poem in several respects. Though the messenger is a parrot, the heroine is a society lady who flourished in Kerala in the 14th century A.D. It is often suggested that the heroine was the wife or sweet-heart of the poet. She is referred to as Raṅgalakṣmī and it is often suggested that the name Lakṣmīdāsa implies the indebtedness of the lover to his beloved.

The theme is the message sent by the lover through a parrot to his counter-part. The messenger is to go from Rāmeśvaram in the south where the separated lover sojourns, upto Tṛkkaṇāmatilakam referred to as Guṇakā, which is situated near the modern Crangannore in north Kerala. The route covers various places of cultural and historical interest like Cape Comorin, Śucīndram, Trivandrum, Quilon, Tiruvalla, Kaduthurutti, etc. The great temples in these localities are mentioned along with their characteristic features. Rivers like Phullā and Cūrṇī are referred to on the way. The quality of the work has prompted scholars to compose several commentaries on it, though most of them remain unpublished.

The success of Śukasandeśa has prompted other writers to produce works of this kind. Even some of the well known writers like Pūrṇasarasvati and Uddaṇḍa Sāstri composed Śandeśakāvyas, not to speak of several other poets of the region. As at present we have nearly thirty poems of the kind.

(2) HAMSASANDEŚA (1)

In the 14th century itself we have yet another message poem coming from the pen of a Kerala scholar and commentator. Pūrṇasarasvatī, a disciple of Pūrṇajyotis has composed a poem called Hamsasaṅdesa[5] adopting a novel theme. Unlike the Śukasandeśa, the poem is not divided into two sections called Pūrvabhāga and Uttarabhāga and it altogether contains 102 stanzas. It seems the poem is incomplete as available now.

A maiden of Kāñcīpuram happens to be attracted by the charm of Kṛṣṇa, the lord of Gopis, while she was witnessing a festival. After some time she sends a swan to Vṛndāvana, the abode of Kṛṣṇa detailing the pangs for the union with him. Here an overtone of Bhakti or devotion to lord is the urge behind the composition of the poem unlike in the usual message poems where love in separation forms the predominant sentiment. The messenger has to pass through the countries of Cola, Pāṇḍya and Kerala. Rivers like Kāveri, Tāmraparṇī and Kālindī are described on the way and temples at Anantaśayana and Raktadruma (Tṛccemmaram) are prominently referred to. Vṛndāvan forms the destination while the message conveys the unfailing devotion of the maiden to her supreme lord. Thus the second message poem produced in Kerala shows an originality in the very conception of the theme.

(3) KOKILASANDEŚA

One seldom comes across any other poet outside Kerala who has contributed so much to the propagation of Sanskrit in this region than Uddaṇḍa Śāstri, the author of the famous lyric called Kokilasandeśa.[6] Though born in Toṇḍamaṇḍalam in Chingleput in the Madras presidency, he spent the larger part of his life in the soil of Kerala travelling the length and breadth of the land referred to by him in his works in glorious terms. An extraordinary scholar endowed with erudition and talent, Uddaṇḍa has endeared himself to the Keralites taking part in the various, scholastic deliberations and other cultural activities of the age.

Kokilasandeśa, a beautiful lyric in 162 stanzas and divided into two parts, is one of the best of the type. The author assumes the role of the hero and despatches a message to his consort living in the Mārakkara house of Cennamaṅgalam. The messenger who is a Kokila is asked to go to Kerala from Toṇḍamaṇḍalam in the Madras State which is the native place of the poet. The work affords an occasion to the author to describe various places of interest like shrines and rivers and to refer to various celebrities of the time with whom he had been in good relations.

The route preferred by the poet is a northern one as against the southern course described by Lakṣmīdāsa in his Śukasandeśa. The destination being almost very near to each other-Tṛkkaṇāmatilakam (Guṇakā) and Cennamaṅgalam (Jayantamaṅgalam) both located in Cochin, these two together afford a complete geographical and cultural account of Kerala.

Reference is made to rivers like Kampā, Kṣīrasindhu (Pālār), Kāverī and Nīvā-all in Tamilnadu and Nilā (Bhāratappuḷa), Vāṅmayī (Vāvalippuḷa), Cūrṇī (Periyār), Valli (Valliyār) in Kerala. The region through which the messenger is to pass by are: Kāñcī, Tuṇḍīra, Hosala and Cola-all in Tamilnadu and Northern Kottayam (the capital of Purali kings), Kolam (or Kolattunadu), (Kukkuṭakroḍa (Calicut), Prakāśa (Veṭṭattunāḍu), Raṇakhala (Porkkalam), Koṭuṅṅallūr, Añjanakhala (Tiruvanchikkulam) alias Mahodayapuram, Vanneri and Jayantamaṅgalam (Cennamaṅgalam) all in Kerala.

A number of temples and sacred spots are mentioned as lying on the course. They are : Kāmākṣī temple at Kāñcī, Viṣṇu temple at Karigiri, Śiva temple at Vilvakṣetra, Viṣṇu temple at Lakṣmīnārāyaṇapuram, Raṅganātha temple at Śrīraṅgam, Viṣṇu temple at Tirunelli, Śiva temple at Cerumannam, Mūkāmbi shrine (Śrī Porkkali near Cerumannam). (Śiva temple at Periñcellūr (Sampadgrāma), Kṛṣṇa temple at Śambara (Tṛcemmaram), Mṛtyuñjaya temple at Śvetāraṇya Viṣṇu temple at Tirunelli, Sāstā temple at Śambarakroḍa (Camravaṭṭam), Kātyāyanī temple at Muktipurī (Mukkola), Śiva temple at Vṛṣapurī (Trichur), Ardhanārīśvara temple at Peruvanam, Durgā temple at Saṁgamagrāma, Iriñjālakkuda), and Śiva temple at Añjanakhala (Tiruvañcikkulam). Festivals of Kāmāksi temple in the month of Phālguna and the Mahāmāghasevā (popularly known as Māmāṅkam) at Tirunāvā are also mentioned in this connection. The Sahya mountain and the Arabian sea are also referred to in the poem. The inspiring description of the various places shows the familiarity of the poet with the respective regions. He has tried to bring out the cultural significance of the regions by referring to the famous poets and scholars of the locality. Mention is made of the seniormost member of the Payyūr family of scholars, whom he calls Maharṣi. His son Parameśvara is eulogised by the poet as Mīmāṁsakacakravarti. Others mentioned by him include poet Śaṅkara of Kolam and Netranārāyaṇa, the famous astrologer. In short the work deserves an honoured place among the select band of its own genre, though the influence of Meghadūta and Śukasandeśa is evident in it.

Dr. Urmila Sharma Collection, Varanasi

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

(4) CAKORASANDEŚA (1)

A poet called Vāsudeva has composed Cakorasandeśa[7] in which the heroine sends a messenger to the hero as in the case of the Haṁsasandeśa of Pūrṇasarasvati. Regarding the identity of the author there is some doubt He may either have been a member of the famous Payyūr family or a native of Vedāraṇya. But there is no positive evidence to assert his identity. Some say that the name of the author might be Parameśvara[8] of Payyūr while others disagree with it.

The poem contains 190 stanzas and there is no division into two sections. The heroine living at Cidambaram (Śārddūlapuram) with her consort is separated from him since be goes on a visit to Vedāraṇya in Kerala along with some Brahmins to worship the goddess there in connection with a solar eclipse. The worship at the shrine is considered auspicious on that day. The consort felt the pangs of separation and sends a message through a Cakora. The destination of the messenger is Vedāraṇya, though he may come across the hero in some other temples on the way since the hero is on a pilgrimage. The subject matter of the poem is imaginary and not connected with any particular incident.

The poem contains much geographical information, though its historical value is limited. The places referred to include many important regions of Kerala. Localities like Śucīndram, the village Śilīndhra, Trivandrum, Quilon, Cengannūr, Tiruvallā, Kumāranallūr, Vaikom, Trippunithura, Tṛkkāriyūr, Edappally, Cennamaṅgalam, Iriñjālakkuḍa, Perumanam, Tiruvañcikkulam, Tiruvālūr, Govindapuram, Kṛṣṇapuram, Kaḷukampalam, Tṛkkaṇāmatilakam, Trichur, Ariyannūr, Guruvāyūr, Śaṅkarapuram, Śaktigrāmam, Tirunāvā and Camravaṭṭam are referred to in addition to certain rivers on the way. Geographically no sequence is maintained in describing the places and the route given is circuitous. Still the value of the poem as a source of ancient geography of Kerala cannot be underrated.

(5) MAYŪRASANDEŚA (1)

Udaya, a member of a royal family and the author of commentary called Kaumudī on the Dhvanyālokalocana of Abhinavagupta has composed a beautiful message poem called Mayūrasandeśa[9] where the messenger is a peacock. It has been established beyond doubt that Udaya belonged to the Maṇakkulam royal family of Kerala the members of which had the hereditary 'Śrīkaṇṭha'. The date of the work can be assigned to the beginning of the 16th century.

The hero Śrīkaṇṭha, identified with the author, sends a message of love to Māracemantikā at Annakkara near Kunnamkulam. The heroine is also known as Iṭṭimā and her house name is Taccappilli. It is by peculiar circumstances that the hero and the heroine are separated. While the hero was enjoying the company of his consort atop a lofty mansion, some celestials passing through the sky happened to see him. They mistook the couple for Śiva and Pārvatī and came down to worship them. The hero made fun of them for their mistake. This prompted the celestials to curse the couple with separation. After persuasion the hero was permitted by the celestials to live in a Viṣṇu temple during the period of the curse and as a result he came to Trivandrum. This affords an occasion for the poet to describe the route from Trivandrum to Annakkara in the north. The messenger has to proceed along the coastal route from Varkala to Quilon. Then turning slightly to the east he is to go to Kottayam via Kaṇṭiyūr, the capital of the Kāyamkulam kings. Passing by Eṭṭumānūr and crossing the river Phullā (Muvāttupuzha) he is to reach Trippunithura, the residence of the Cochin rulers. After crossing the Alwaye river and passing through Cennamangalam. Crangannore and Iriñjālakkuda, the messenger is to reach Brahmakkala where the heroine Māracemantikā alias Umā resides.

The influence of the 14th century message poem like Śukasandeśa of Lakṣmīdāsa and Uṇṇunīlisandeśam, a Malayalam poem of anonymous authorship is quite apparent. Uddaṇḍa, the author of Kokilasandeśa is also mentioned in the work.

(6) SUBHAGASANDEŚA

Subhagasandeśa of Nārāyaṇa is an important poem since it contains much information about the geographical and historical aspects of Kerala. The author was a Nampūtiri Brahmin who flourished under the patronage of

Dr. Urmila Sharma Collection, Varanasi

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

a king of Quilon and his nephew, the identity of the author could not be established. Some identify this king with Rāmavarman. who ruled over Quilon between 1541 to 1547 A.D.[10] Others suggest that this Nārāyaṇa may be identified with the famous grammarian Melputtūr Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭa. But the view is not accepted by later writers for want of evidence.[11]

In the poem, the messenger is Subhaga, a Snātaka Brahmin belonging to the Lāṭa country. He is requested by the separated hero to take a love message from Cape Comorin to Trichur where the heroine resides. The route from the south to the destination in the north is through the Tamil country. The messenger is to proceed to Cidambaram first and then to came back to Kerala through Palghat. On the way to Cidambaram, the messenger has to pass through places like Iṭalakkuṭi, Paṇakuṭi, Alwār Tirunagari, Teṅkāśi, Śrīvillipputtūr, Tiruppuramkuntram, Tirumaliruncolai (Ṛṣabhagiri). From Cidambaram he has to travel southward to worship the deities at Kumbhakonam, Śrīraṅgam and Jambukeśvaram. After crossing Coimbatore he has to reach Palghat in Kerala before proceeding to the destination at Trichur.

The heroine of the piece is Mānavīmenakā who is separated from the hero while they were enjoying the pleasures of life living in Trichur. He was taken from the company of his beloved and cast off at Cape Comorin by fate. The poem contains references to the rulers of Quilon and the Zamorin of Calicut, keeping silence about the Cochin royal family, perhaps because the last mentioned rulers might have lost their fame. The period of composition is generally assigned to the 16th century A. D.

(7) BHṚṄGASANDEŚA (I)

The Bhṛṅgasandeśa[12], attributed to the authorship of Vāsudeva, is also known as Bhramarasandeśa. It contains 177 stanzas. The author was a contemporary of Melputtūr Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭa and hence the work can be assigned to the 16th century A.D. Among the contemporaries of the author he has mentioned Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭa and his father Mātṛdatta and Acyuta Pisharoti of Tṛkkaṇṭiyūr. Since the poem also refers to the curing of rheumatism by the worship of the lord of Guruvāyūr one is tempted to believe that it was written after the composition of the famous stotra Nārāyaṇīya of Melputtūr.

The heroine of the poem is Bālanīlī, popularly called Uṇṇunīlī in the vernacular, who in all probability was the consort of the author Vāsudeva. The hero is snatched away from the company of the heroine when they were enjoying the pleasures of love on the top of a lofty mansion at Koṭṭakkal. A Yakṣī kidnaps the hero to the top of the Malaya mount with a view to enjoying amorous pleasures with him, but she sees her own husband on the way and leaves the hero at Trivandrum. Since it takes almost a month for him to reach Koṭṭakkal he sends a bee to his sweetheart with a message of love. The house name of the heroine is Bālayakṣa probably, a Sanskritized form of Cerucakkam.

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

The route lies between Trivandrum and Koṭṭakkal. Descriptions of places, temples, rivers etc., are important from historical and cultural points of view. Among the places mentioned are: Trivandrum, Quilon, Tekkumkūr ruled by Udayamārtāṇḍa, the capital of Tekkumkūr, Vaṭakkumkūr ruled by Godavarma, Kuṭamālūr the capital of Cempakaśśeri rulers, Trippunithura, Cochin, Tṛkkaṇāmatilakam and Iriñjālakkuda. Several temples on the way find mention in the poem like the Viṣṇu temple at Tiruvalla, Kṛṣṇa temple at Tiruvārppu, Kātyāyanī temple at Kumāranallūr, Śiva temple at Vaikom. Śiva temple at Tiruvanchikkulam, Bhadrakālī temple at Koṭuṅṅallūr, Viṣṇu temple at Iriñjālakkuḍa, Durgā temple at Urakam, Śiva temple at Trichur, Viṣṇu temple at Guruvāyūr, Durgā temple at Mukkola, Viṣṇu temple at Tirunāva. Backwaters at Aṣṭamuṭi near Quilon and rivers like Muriñṅāpuḷa, Bhāratappuḷa etc.; are also referred to.

At Tirunāvā, the poet describes the festival of Māmāṅkam presided over traditionally by the Zamorin of Calicut, There is a reference to the ancestral palace of the Cochin rulers at the west-coast. This was built for them by the Dutch. The fight between the Cochin king and the Zamorin are referred to, stating that the messenger may be mistaken for a gun shot by the soldiers. The venue of the fight is mentioned as Tiruvañchikkulam.

The influence of the Malayalam poem Uṇṇunīlisandeśam is apparent. Lakṣmīdāsa too has influenced the poet to some extent. Still the poem is very important since it sheds much new light on the cultural history of Kerala of the middle centuries.

(8) KĀMASANDEŚA

Kāmasandeśa[13] a poem divided into two parts and containing respectively 66 and 69 stanzas is composed by Mātṛdatta of Melputtūr who was the father of the famous grammarian-poet Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭa of the same illustrious house. The date of the work can be assigned to the 16th century A.D. since it refers to the Māhāmagham festival and the rulers like Rāmavarmā of Cochin, Vīra, Acyuta etc; who flourished at that time.

Curiously enough, Kāmadeva, the god of love, is chosen as the messenger in the poem. He is to carry the message to the place where his beloved Candralakṣmī resides. The poet describes places, shrines, kingdoms, mountains and rivers while detailing the course. Among this are included holy places like Śivagaṅgā, Kāverī, Kaṇḍaramānikkam, Madhyārjunam (Tiruviṭaimaruttūr), Kumbhakoṇam, Śrīraṅgam, Koṅkaṇ, Park-temple at Coimbatore, Sahya mountain, the region called Maṅgalam, Trichur, Iṣṭakroḍa (Tirumiṭṭakroḍa), Kurukṣetra (Śukapura), Ambāśaila (Koṭikkunnu), Amlaśaila (Velliyankallu), Bhāratappuḷa and Tirunāvā.

The poet also refers to various illustrious persons like Maṅgala, a Brahmin scholar who was considered as a compeer to Kālidāsa. Rāmavarmā, the most outstanding king of Cochin during the Portuguese period is referred to in the poem. He is said to have established the toll system in regard to the river Kāverī. He is also mentioned as constructing a palace a little to the north of Trichur. The greedy king Vīra mentioned in the poem cannot be identified with Vīrappa Nāyak of Mysore (1572-1595 A.D.). He seems to have wielded control over his feudatories and an inscription at Śrīraṅga mentions him as a powerful chieftain. It was he who permitted the Jesuit missionaries to build a church and presbytery in Madura for the first time. Acyutappa Nāyak of Tanjore (1560-1614 A. D.) is also mentioned as ruling the region to the northern part of the river Kāverī. He is referred to as an evil ruler who is incomparable in valour. After crossing the Palghat gap the messenger reaches the region of a Nāyaka king (a nair ruler of Kerala) who is wealthy, docile and unrivalled in quality. The poem also mentions a Zamorin of Calicut who built the big kitchen and dining hall to the north of the Viṣṇu shrine at Tirunāvā. The ruler is often identified with Mānavikrama who occupied the Chāliyam fort in the second half of the 16th century A.D.

(9) KOKASANDEŚA

Kokasandeśa[14] of Viṣṇutrāta assigned to the 16th century is a long poem having 306 verses consisting of 120 in the first part and 186 in the second. The author was a Nampūtiri Brahmin of Vālappalli (Rambhāvihāri) near Karūrppaṭanna in Cochin.

The theme is imaginary in that both the places from where the messenger is sent as well as his destination, viz; Śrīvihāra and Kāmārāma. So too are the places mentioned on the route. As a result of a trick practised by a magician, the hero, a prince feels that he is separated from his consort and taken far away. He sends a Koka with a love message to his beloved. The messenger has to go from Śrīvihāra to Kāmārāma and on the route he has to paces through places like Vāraṇa lake called Sundara, the capital of Sacandra, the Sāstā temple at Pūrṇānanda etc. These places are not real. The poet claims to have been a friend of a scholar named Brahmadatta whose identity is not yet established. The poem is highly artificial and it has no value from historical and geographical points of view. The poet is gifted in that he has a good command over the language though he lacks good literary taste.

Nampūtiri Brahmin of Tirumānthāmkunnu in Malabar to Kārttika Tirunāl Rāmavarma Mahārāja of Travancore through a Cātaka bird. Instead of Vipralambhaśṛṅgāra one finds the delineation of the sentiment of Dānavīra here for the first time in a poem of this type.

When Tippu Sultan invaded Malabar in 1787 a poor Brahmin took refuge in Travancore ruled at that time by Kārttika Tirunāl. Later due to a sudden illness he returned to his home without formally taking leave of the king. There he worshipped goddess Kāli at Tirumānthāmkunnu. One day, he informed his hardship to his former protector and chose a Cātaka sitting in a garden, as his messenger. The bird is asked to go to Trivandrum with his message of entreaty for financial help. The poem divided into two parts consists of 141 stanzas as a whole. It gives some useful information of Kerala during the 18th century. Among the celebrities of the period Pāliyattu Komi Accan and the reputed physician Ciraṭṭamaṇ Mūssatu are named by the poet.

Several rivers, places of cultural interest and personalities are mentioned in the course of the poem. Deities of the temples of Camravaṭṭam, Tirunāvā, Trichur, Peruvanam, Ūrakam, Iriñjālakkuḍa, Koṭuṅṅallūr, Trippunithura, Vaikam, Kalarkoṭu, Ampalappula and Haripād are referred to in worshipful terms. Rivers like Bhāratappula and Periyār are crossed by the messenger who also passes through places like Cennamaṅgalam, Cempakaśśeri, Kayamkulam, Kṛṣṇapuram, Quilon, Karamana, Neyyāttinkara, Pāraśāla and Kulittura. He is asked to go to the famous Padmanābhapuram palace where the king is likely to stay. The great Diwān Rāmayyan Dalawā (the minister) is also mentioned. In short, the poem gives some useful account of the Travancore State of the 18th century. Kārttika Tirunāl, the illustrious ruler and patron is eulogised in several verses.

(11) CAKORASANDEŚA (2)

The Cakorasandeśa[16] of anonymous authorship is a short poem consisting of 50 and 46 verses in two parts. It is unique in conception in that the separation of the hero and the heroine is not brought about by fate. The hero goes away from the side of the lady wilfully because of her open hostility towards him. He reaches Alwaye on the banks of the Cūrṇī river being heart broken by the behaviour of his wife. From there, after sometime he sends a message to her living at Trichur through a Cakora bird. Seeing the Cakora and hearing its sound as auspicious the hero chooses him as his messenger.

Passing the Cūrṇī river the messenger is to go to Guhapura where lord Subrahmania is consecrated. Then he will see the setu constructed by a king of Vañcī (Travancore). Other places mentioned are Iriñjālakkuḍa and Ūrakam where Viṣṇu and Durgā are installed in shrines. In the second part there is a glowing description of Trichur where the lady resides.

The poem refers to a Zamorin of Calicut as the builder of the famous Perumanam temple. He became famous by this pious action as did Kuru who built the Kurukṣetra. Historically we have no corroboration for this statement, though in a document it is seen that the Zamorin provided copper sheets over the roof of the temples of Peruvana and Tiruvilvāmala. In a stanza the fort called Neṭumkoṭṭa or Travancore lines is referred to. It was built by king Kārttika Tirunāl Rāmavarma under the supervision of his Dutch commander D'Lannoy and Chief minister Rāja Keśava Das in 1789 with a view to protecting the state from the impending invasion of the Mysore Sultans. This line runs over thirty miles in length from west to east touching both Vaipin island on the sea coast and Ānamalai in the Western ghats.

(12) ŚĀRIKĀSANDEŚA

Rāmapāṇivāda, a well known poet of Kerala who belonged to the 18th century is credited with the authorship of a beautiful lyric called Śārikāsandeśa.[17] The last three stanzas forming a colophon mention the identity of the author. He has referred to the prosperous country of Campakaśreṇī (Chempakaśreṇī (Chempakaśśerī in the erstwhile Travancore State identified with modern Ambalappula) and its Brahmin king Devanārāyaṇa. He also mentions his preceptor Nārāyaṇa a renowned scholar and foremost among the educated Brahmins of the time. Since the preceptor is referred to as world famous it is likely that he is identical with the famous Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭa of Melputtūr whose masterpiece is the Prakriyāsarvasva, a treatise on grammar. The author also states that the poem was composed when he was residing at the place called Amaraṭaṭinī which is only a Sanskritised form of Ampalappula. The only manuscript of the work has been recently unearthed from the house of a Namputiri Brahmin of Varavur in Trichur district.

The poem consisting of 122 stanzas is not divided into parts and the traditional mode of describing the route for the messenger is not adopted. The messenger chosen is a Śārikā who is to proceed from Vṛndāvana, the abode of Kṛṣṇa to Ampalappuḷa in Kerala.

A cowherd damsel, already in love with Kṛṣṇa, conceals herself in a bower on the banks of the river Yamunā in Vṛndāvan in a hut. Tormented by love she remains there for sometime and at last gets out of the bower to share the company of the lover. To her consternation, the lover is not to be seen in spite of a thorough search of the region. She wails aloud repenting her action of concealing herself from the lover and wanders about Vṛndāvan gardens to search for the truant beloved. Then she happens to hear an unearthly voice to the effect that the lord has gone to Kerala where he occupies the shrine at Amaratatinī (Ampalappuḷa). The place is verily a holy ghat and the region is ruled by a Brahmin king called Devanārāyaṇa. The voice suggests that she may send a suitable messenger to her lord to convey her feelings. Accordingly she returns to her home and sends a message of love to her lord through a Śārikā bird. The bird performs the duty entrusted to it and the couple is united once again. After having pleased the sweetheart with his presence and sharing with her the pleasures of love, the lord returns to his shrine in Kerala.

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

The piece is in the mould of a message poem though in fact it is only a eulogy or hymn on lord Kṛṣṇa installed in the famous temple at Ampalappuḷa variously called Amaratatinī Devavāhinī. Thus the work is unique in conception. It comes to an end with a benediction to the effect that lord who gave bliss to his consort may protect the devotees.

The work is edited by Dr. C.M. Neelakantan with a Sanskrit commentary by Kalakkattu Govindan Nampyar. (Nag Publishers, Delhi, 1987)

(13) NĪLAKAṆṬHASANDEŚA

Śrīdharan Nampi of the famous Punnaśśeri house (referred to as Punnāgaśreṇī in Sanskrit) in Paṭṭāmbi has composed a poem called Nīlakaṇṭhasandeśa,[18] consisting of 126 verses in all. The poem is not conventionally divided into two parts. The author flourished between 1774-1830 A.D. and was a student of the famous astrologer called Bharata Pisharoti. He claims that the members of his family were the ministers of the Zamorins and managed the affairs of Eralppāḍ, the heir-apparent.

The poem is a love message sent by the hero from Ilāpuram (Iñṅayūr) to Śreṇikā (Cerpulaśśeri) where his separated beloved resides. It begins with a statement that a lover is separated from his beloved. The circumstances for the separation and the identity of the heroine etc.; are not mentioned by the poet. The separated lover sojourns in a lonely hermitage in Ilākṣetra on the northern bank of the river Nīla or Bhāratappuḷa. From there he sends a message of love to his beloved through a Nīlakaṇṭha or a peacock whom he chances to meet. The messenger is to go to a house near Śastākṣetra at Cerpulaśśéri. In describing the route the various important places like Kasthalī, Puṣpakroḍa, Marutapura on the banks of the river Vallāpagā, Śūrakroḍa and Maṇiyanaṭam. These are the Sanskritised versions of certain localities between Paṭṭāmbi and Cerpulaśśeri in modern Kerala. In Śreṇikā, which is the destination, the house of the heroine is situated at the northern side of a temple dedicated to Śāstā. The poet gives a glorious description of the shrine and the damsels who come to worship the deity. After paying obeisance to the god the messenger is to visit the heroine and to communicate the message to her.

Incidentally the author has referred to the movements of the European couples in conveyances like palanquins; study of Mīmāṁsā philosophy of the Jaimini school; residence of a renowned Brahmin scholar called Śrīnivāsa etc. A historical incident also is mentioned by the poet in the form of a fight between the Zamorin and Hyder Ali, the Mysore ruler, at the battle field of Tāluśrī (Cāluśśeri). Since the distance between the starting point and the destination is limited, the author has resorted to the description of sea, mountain, temples etc., at some length. In the concluding stanza, the number of verses in the poem is mentioned as 126. The poet also claims that the reader of the poem is sure to get salvation-a practice usually noted at the end of religious hymns. The literary value of the poem is not of a high order and among the poems of the kind it occupies only a third rate position.

(14) BHṚṄGASANDEŚA (2)

There is another poem called Bhṛṅgasandeśa[19], of anonymous authorship, in which a bee happens to be a messenger. The bee is asked by the hero to take a love message from a place near Crangannore to his wife at Trichur by the hero. The separated lover wanders about and rests under a mango tree when he chances to meet the bee. The places described on the route are Crangannore, Ciṅṅapuram, the white palace of kings, the houses of merchants, a big tank to the left of the road, a feeding house of Brahmins maintained by the king of Cochin, the Brahmin village called Sitamaṅgaladeśa, the temple belonging to the king's minister, a dam, the Irīṅṅalakkuḍa temple dedicated to Bharata, the place called Māprāṇa, the house of a Brahmin well known as the feeding centre of the poor, the river Nandī, a Śāstā temple (probably Tiruvellakkāvu), Perumanam where at that time lived the Brahmin scholar named Ārubhaṭṭa and Trichur. The house of the heroine is located to the west of the Śiva temple at Trichur.

Ārubhaṭṭa mentioned in the poem is often identified with Ārūr Aṭitiri, the author of the poem Uttaranaiṣadha, who lived in the beginning of the 19th century. Hence the author must have lived during this time. The reference to the deity of Iriṅṅālakkuḍa as Bharata also suggests a later date to the poem.

(15) HAṀSASANDEŚA (2)

Another poem entitled Haṁsasandeśa[20] of anonymous authorship contains 83 and 88 stanzas respectively in the two parts. Here a lover sends a message from Ceylon to Kuṭamālūr in central Travancore. The date of the composition is between 1829 and 1844 A.D.

A demoness takes away the hero from the heroine and leaves him in Laṅkā at the command of Vibhīṣaṇa. There he accosts a swan and implores him to take a message to Kuṭamālūr where the lady resides. The messenger has to pass the Setu and worship at the Rāmeśvaram temple on his way. Rising to the sky, he can see the river Tāmraparṇī on the banks of which there are Brahmins well versed in Vedic rites. Then the messenger will notice the capital city called Maṇalūr studded with emerald. Now the Sahyan ranges can be seen. Passing over it, he will reach Kerala, full of coconut and arecanut palms bent down with fruits and embraced by pepper creepers. Nearby at Cape Comorin resides Pārvatī. The next place is Marutvāmala where many sages perform penances. Soon the messenger will reach the Śucīndram temple of Śiva who is in company with Brahmā and Viṣṇu. There the people judge the truth of actions of an accused person by dipping his hands in boiled ghee. Then he is to reach Trivandrum where he could worship god Padmanābha reposing on a bed of serpents. The palace of the king of Travancore also can be seen here.

There are two paths to go to the north from Trivandrum. One is difficult and full of rocks and mountains, while the other is through the sea shore. The latter it to be resorted to by the swan. On the way is situated the city of Quilon. There the Europeans dressed in coats and pants and feeling tipsy because of the use of liquor can be seen with consorts on the balconies. The next place is Ampalappuḷa where lord Kṛṣṇa can be worshipped. Nearby the river Gauṇa may be seen. The tired swan could rest on a huge tree on the banks of the river. From there he can see the house of the lady at Kuṭamālūr. The two routes mentioned in the poem are Main Central Road and the National Highway at present.

(16) KAPOTASANDEŚA (1)

This is an incomplete poem belonging to the category of Sandeśakāvyas.[21] The Kapotasandeśa is written by Kuṉṉuṇṇi Kurupu who belonged to the Kuṭṭamattu family in the Kasaṟgode Taluk. The author flourished between 1813-1885.

Only a few stanzas of this interesting work is available now. In a particular stanza the author has made a dig at one Vāsu Nambīśan who criticised the works of the poet. This reminds one of Kālidāsa's alleged reference to Diṅnāga in his Meghasandeśa.

(17) KAPOTASANDEŚA (2)

There is another poem called Kapotasandeśa[22] by one Nārāyaṇan Mūssatu of Taikkāṭu house. The author was the son of one Vāsudevan Mūssatu and was born in 1870 and died in 1907. The poem is incomplete and remains unpublished.

A lover living at Laṅkā meets a Kapota. The separated and forlorn lover wants to send a love message to his sweet-heart. The poem is attractive and the author has a good command over the language.

(18) ŚYENASANDEŚA

Though incomplete as available now, the Śyenasandeśa is one of the best poems of the kind produced in Kerala. Only 38 verses at the beginning of the poem are now obtained.[23] The places on the route from Vayaskara in Kottayam to Ernakulam are described in the available portion.

The author of this work is one Āryan Nārāyaṇan Mūssatu of the famous Vayaskara family of Ayurvedic physicians. He lived during the period between 1841-1902 A.D. The poem is in the from of a love message sent by a Gandharva residing at Vayaskara to his beloved in Tirumānthāmkunnu through a Śyena-vulture. The Gandharva was cursed to remain as a tree for a hundred years and hence he happened to be separated from his consort. Undoubtedly the author has derived inspiration from Kālidāsa and has moulded a local legend in to the framework of a message of a poem. The places described are located between Kottayam and Cochin in Kerala.

(19) VIPRASANDEŚA

Koccuṇṇi Tampurān of Koṭuṅṅallūr (1858-1926), a prolific writer who was often called the 'Kavisārvabhauma' has composed the poem called Viprasandeśa.[24]

The hero of the poem is a 32 year old Brahmin who went to Kāśī (Benares) knowing that he had only six months to live according to astrological calculations. He remained there practising austerities and performing sacrifices. One day he felt the pangs of separation from his consort and he decided to send a message of love and hope to his wife through a Brahmin who happened to visit Kāśī on a pilgrimage. The messenger travels by train and passes through various regions between Banares and Trivandrum. Some of the prominent places mentioned are Prayāgā, Jabalpur and Bhospur before entering the territory of Kerala. Rivers like Narmadā, Godāvarī and Kṛṣṇā too are described. Kings of Travancore and the Zamorin of Calicut also find mention in the poem. The description of an elephant belonging to the Vaikam temple in Travancore is a glorious one. Among the message poems the present one is unique and contains much historical information.

The poem is autobiographical in nature though it is couched in the form of a Sandeśakāvya. The author saw in a dream that he had only six months more to live. He consulted Keralavarma Valiyakoil Tampuran, the Keralakālidāsa, who advised him to worship the deity of Koṭuṅṅallur. As a result the author lived upto the age of 68. With suitable deviations the incident is portrayed in the present work.

(20) CĀTAKASANDEŚA (2)

Kuṉṉikkuṭṭan Tampurān of Koṭuṅṅallūr (1805-1913) renowned as Keralavyāsa has composed one Cātakasandeśa[25] where the messenger is a Cātaka bird. In the poem, the route from Vehkiṭaṁhu near Guruvāyūr to Haripad is described. This is an enchanting love lyric. Actually this is a wrong identification. The work is the same as the one by Māntiṭṭa Śāstṛ Śarmā with the same title.

(21) HAṀSASANDEŚA (3)

Nārāyaṇan Nambīśan belonging to the Mūriyil house in Trichur has composed the Haṁsasandeśa.[26], He lived in the early part of the 20th century. The hero of the poem is none other than the great Kālidāsa while the heroine is Gairvāṇī- the Sanskrit language itself represented by the Vedapāṭhaśālā of Chittūr in Kerala. The hero sends a message from Amaravatī (heaven) to Gairvāṇī, the goddess of Sanskrit of the above mentioned Pāṭhaśālā, through a swan. The messenger has to pass through places like Mahāmeru, Jambūdvīpa, Kailāsa and Himavān before reaching Chittūr in the Kerala State.

(22) INDUSANDEŚA

This message poem[27] is also composed by Nārāyaṇan Nambīśan of the Mūriyil house. The flight of imagination is evident from the references available, Unfortunately only a fragment of the work is available at present. Hence the details regarding the route etc.; are not known.

(23) PAVANASANDEŚA

Rāmavarma Kuñṅuṇṇi Rājā (1860-1943) of Ciralayattu family near Trichur has written the Pavanasandeśa.[28] The author was the son of Kūṭallūr Kuñcuṇṇi Namputiri. The message is sent by Rāma to Sītā living in Laṁkā as captive. Only fragments are available of the poem. The author himself has commented on the portion.

(24) PIKASANDEŚA

Raṅgācārya, a native or inhabitant of Crangannore has composed a poem called Pikasandeśa.[29] The messenger Pika is asked to go to Karipatipuram. The place from which he is to start is not known. The work has been published in a monthly magazine.

(25) SAMPĀTISANDEŚA

A Nampūtiri Brahmin of Puliyannūr Tekkeppāṭṭu house in Ilavalli near Guruvāyūr is the author of Sampātisandeśa.[30] The poem consisting of 265 verses is one of the biggest of its kind having 134 and 131 stanzas in the two parts. The theme is the love message of Sītā to Rāma sent through Sampāti from Laṁkā. The date of composition is not known. Incidentally places like Trippunithura, Trichur and Ilavalli are mentioned. The poem is not published.

(26) MĀRUTASANDEŚA

A poem of anonymous authorship called Mārutasandeśa[31] contains 62 verses in the first half and 130 verses in the second. The places mentioned are imaginary and as such it has no geographical or historical interest. The hero enjoying the company of his beloved is separated from her and taken to a forest region called Kanakakaṭaka by the turn of fate. The gentle breeze Malaya increases the pangs of separation. He approaches breeze and asks it to be his messenger.

The imaginary town called Kāmadatta where Saudatta kings reside is mentioned. Lord Śiva known as Viśvānanda is consecrated there with Pārvatī. The spring Nimnagā and the forest Ramyaka are attractive to look at. Then Devakāntāra shrine of Viṣṇu is mentioned. Other imaginary places like Mayūrakuñja the abode of Pārvatī and the town of Nāgakāñcī are referred to. There resides king Bhūtivarmā. After bathing in the river Gandhoda in which the Gauḍa ladies bathe, he is to go to Kāmadatta. It is difficult to fix the date of the work since no historical reference is available.

(27) BHṚṄGASANDEŚA (3)

Krishnan Nampūtiri of Māṅgottuśśeri house is the author of this Sandeśakāvya called Bhṛṅgasandeśa[32].' The house is located at Karikkāṭu where the author flourished in the beginning of the 20th century. This beautiful poem is published from Ayodhyā in the Journal called Saṁskṛtam.

(28) HAṂSASANDEŚA (4)

There is an allegorical Sandeśakāvya called Haṁsasandeśa[33] of anonymous authorship. It contains altogether 101 stanzas; 50 in the first part and 51 in the second. Bhakti is the heroine. The poet advises to avoid the philosophical systems like Bauddha etc; and to adopt Suṣumnāmārga as the right path. A Śiva devotee enjoying Advaitānanda resulting from his union with Bhakti, the beloved, is separated due to the effect of his previous Karma. The pangs of separation become unbearable and he yearns to be united with Bhakti. He makes a Haṁsa of his own mind and sends through it a message of a love to his dear one living far away in the abode of Śiva. The illusion caused by the attachment towards worldly affairs forms the reason for separation. The route that the messenger is asked to follow is given thus. The first is the northern quarter and then the holy regions at the confluence of rivers Ganges and Yamunā, where there is a Mūlasthāna guarded by deities Iśa, Gaṇapati, Subrahmaṇya and Durgā. Near to this place is the penance grove of Pārvatī towards the north of which is situated the Kīcakavana where Siddhas enjoy bliss. Also located there is the Mahāmeru and a hall of gems where the Goddess dwells assuming the form of a Kirātī. Above this hill is Pūrṇagirigrāma protected by Goddess Maṅgalāmbā. Then there is the Jalandhara country directed by Īśvara who remains in a hanging posture and above this is she Śivaloka also known as Dvādaśānta. The two-fold course, Adhyātmic and yogic is enunciated to attain bliss. By the first, one attains Śivasāyujya having freed himself from worldly bondages. The yogic course is the mind's journey through various stages, starting with Suṣumnā upto Dvādaśendumaṇḍala and its final repose along with Bhakti in the state of Amṛtayoga. In the field of Sandeśakāvya this marks a new deviation in the whole range. A dry philosophical subject is dealt with here with all the charm and relish of a message poem. It is likely that its author might be a disciple of the great Śaṅkarācārya, who wanted to emulate the work of Vedāntadeśika who wrote a similar poem with a similar name.

(29) BHṚṆGASANDEŚA (4)

There is Prākrit Sandeśakāvya called Bhṛṅgasandeśa[34] of anonymous authorship. It has a Sanskrit cammentary also giving the equivalent forms. This is perhaps the first message poem in Prākrit language. The extant manuscript is incomplete and contains only the first six verses of the poem. In the available portion no detail is mentioned about the name of the hero or the heroine, the place of destination, message etc. The matter available in these six stanzas is just that there was a couple who were intimately associated with each other and had a boon from god Śiva that they will never be separated. The second stanza states that a magician arrives on the scene and creates an illusion of separation between the couple. In the next four stanzas is described the condition of the lover who imagines himself as separated from his beloved.

The text is accompanied by a Sanskrit commentary, the author of which also does not disclose his name. The commentator has quoted lines from Meghadūta, Śākuntala, Karpūramañjarī and Sūtras from the Prākrit grammars of Vararuci and Trivikrama. From his observation that a message poem generally consists of twelve divisions, it can be gathered that he was familiar with the commentaries of Dharmagupta and others who pointed out this feature for the first time while commenting on the Śukasandeśa of Lakṣmīdāsa, the first message poem produced in Kerala.

(30) CĀTAKASANDEŚA

The Cātakasandeśa of Śāstṛśarman popularly known as Māntiṭṭa Kuñcu Nampūtiri (1876-1958).[35] He led an eventful life and contributed to the field of Sanskrit Sāhitya and Śāstra. The manuscript of the work was discovered by late Prof. P.C. Vasudevan Elayathu and it is edited by his son Dr. P.C. Muralimadhavan with his own Sanskrit commentary called Rasikarañjinī.

A Brahmin of Veṅkiṭaṅṅu (Hariharāvāsa) sends a message to his beloved living at Harisaṅgītadeśa (Haripad). The heroine is a princess of the royal family and is none other than the wife of the author. The here is separated from her for one year since he has to perform the Dīkṣā of his deceased elder brother. At the onset of the rainy season he sends a message to the lady through a Cātaka bird. The path from Veṇkiṭaṅṅu to Haripad is described in detail. In the course of the description of the route the author mentions a host of important persons, places, temples and rivers. Scholars living enroute are referred to often. The Sanskritised forms of the places and persons are provided in the text, and they represent modern places like Alappuzha, Ernakulam, Koḍuṅṅallūr, Vaikam, Tiruvanchikkulam etc. Some of the famous temples like Uttareśakṣetram (Trichur), Puṇḍarīkalaya (Vaikam), Kumārakṣetram (Haripad), Pūrṇatrayīśakṣetra (Trippunithura) etc., are also mentioned. A host of 19th century writers and scholars are also referred to by the erudite author. As such the work has a great value from the point of view of Kerala history and culture.

(31) GṚDHRASANDEŚA

This anonymous poem[36] in which a vulture acts as a messenger seems to have been composed by a contemporary of the great poet Uddaṇḍa Śāstri, the author of Kokilasandeśa. From the available portion it is known that the heroine must have been the beloved of the poet. She belonged to the house called 'Taccappa||i'. The poem contains glowing tribute to the poetic genius of Uddaṇḍa Śāstri. The piece is attractive and certainly deserves an important position among the works of its kind.

This is the same as the Mayūraduta of king Udaya described as number 5 above. This is a wrong information on the part of the historian of literature.

(32) MAYŪRADŪTA

Keralavarma Valiyakoyil Tampuran (1854-1915) of Kerala has composed a great message poem in Malayalam. The poem is remarkable since it contains autobiographical elements also. The author had been jailed for some time since he incurred the wrath of the ruling king and was separated from his consort. It is against this background that he despatches a peacock as his messenger to the heroine. N. Kumāran Āśān had attempted[37] a translation into Sanskrit and left it incomplete. Recently Dr. P.K. Narayana Pillai has brought out a complete and wonderful translation of the poem keeping the charm of the original piece in tact.[38] The poem is entitled Mayūradūta.

The brief survey attempted in these pages shows that the genre of poetry has attracted the Kerala authors very much. From about 14th century onwards poets of Kerala began to compose message poems. Some of them eulogised their beloved heroines who made a name on the Kerala stage[39].

It must be admitted that at present this form of literature has declined. The superiority of Meghadūta and its influence on literature are noticeable. Later writers who tried their hands at this mode of composition just emulated Kālidāsa and did not present any originality.[40] Naturally later Sandeśakāvyas did not get sufficient attention from lovers of literature.

UDDAṆḌA AND HIS TIMES

There is no other poet from outside Kerala who has contributed so much to the propagation of Sanskrit in Kerala than Uddaṇḍa Śāstri. Though born in Chingleput District in the Madras Presidency, he spent the larger part of his life in the soil of Kerala travelling the length and breadth of the land referred to by him in his Kokila Sandeśa [KS] as the creation of the great Paraśurāma. A scholar of extraordinary erudition and talent, he has endeared himself to the Keralites, taking part in the various scholastic deliberations and other activities. Indirectly he has admitted that he could not get the desired encouragement from nowhere else. He has figured in many legends as a colossus among the reputed scholars.

From the prologue of his Mallikāmāruta[1] [MM] composed while he was staying in Kerala, the details of his native place, parentage etc., are known. To quote his own words: "There is the great Brahmin village called Lāṭapuram washed by the waves of the Kṣiranadī (Pālār) in the Tuṇḍīra (Toṇḍamaṇḍalam) region in South India where the poet-peacocks dance by the blessing of the goddess Kāmākṣī. There live the great Brahmins who are wealthy in penance, who consider the different Śāstras as their children, who have scrupulously performed great sacrificial rites, who are well-versed in the Vedic lore having been born in great families, in whose tongue the goddess of speech resides and who pass the days receiving the guests. Belonging to this reputed clan there was a scholar named Gokulanātha of the Āpastamba sect and Vādhūla gotra. He had a son called Kṛṣṇa to whom was born a son known as Rangañathabhaṭṭa who in due course begot the son Irugupanātha alias Uddaṇḍa. He having studied the various Śāstras from worthy preceptors, set out from his native place to see the different regions and came to Kerala after passing through Andhra, Karnataka, Kalinga and Cola, dipping in great rivers, worshipping in temples, courting worthy people, congratulating the meritorious scholars and entered the city of Kukkuḍakroḍa (Calicut)'.[2] The verses at the end of the acts of the play also refer to his name along with that of his parents and thus we know that his mother was Raṅgadevī.[3]

The view[4] that Nallā Dīkṣitar alias Bhūminātha, the disciple of Rāmabbadra Dīkṣitar (c. 18th century AD) has said in his drama Subhadrāharaṇa that Raṅganātha and Uddaṇḍa have once lived in Kuṇḍaramāṇikya village in Tanjore District, is endorsed by some.[5] But others reject the view and point out that the term 'uddaṇḍapaṇḍitādhyuṣita' which is also found in the Śṛṅgārasarvasva Bhāṇa, may be taken to mean 'inhabited by great scholars'.[6]

In the KS[7] also the poet refers to his native place pointing out the great qualities of the Brahmins of the locality which are already mentioned in his drama. Further, the enumeration of the various rivers and temples in describing the route of the messenger corroborates his earlier statement.

It is also surmised that Uddaṇḍa had entered into a matrimonial alliance with a Nair lady of the Mārakkara house in Cennamaṅgalam at Cochin. He has explicitly referred to the house of Mārakkara which according to him, connotes the various qualities like Māhābhāgya etc. It is the lady of the house who is made the heroine of the lyric, the author himself being the hero sending a message from his native place. Udaya, the author of the Mayūrasandeśa, has referred to Cennamaṅgalam saying that Uddaṇḍa is likely to be found there obviously implying his matrimonial relation with a lady of the region.[8] But according to some the lady of the Mārakkara house might have been the wife of his patron Mānavikrama and our poet is paying his respects in this poem to his master's consort—a theory quite fanciful rather than having any basis. Further it is said that the heroine of the lyric is one Śrīdevī! eulogised in Śrīdevīpraśasti-a work of anonymous authorship.[9] It is needless to say that there is no evidence to support this view.

Obviously Uddaṇḍa had established very good relations with some of the celebrities of the time, among whom the royal patron Mānavikrama of Calicut, the noted Mīmāmsā scholar of the Payyūr family known as Maharsi, Cennās Nampūtirippāḍ, the author of the Tantrasamuccaya and Kākkaśśeri Dāmodarabhaṭṭa may be included. He has referred to some of them in laudable terms.

It is conjectured that he might have come to Kerala at about the age of 25 and that he had spent the remaining part of his life in this adopted land.[10] It is also believed that he had a brother who followed him to Kerala and that the latter presented the Payyūr Bhaṭṭa with some rare books kept by Uddaṇḍa after the death of the scholar.[11] According to another view when Uddaṇḍa was outclassed by Dāmodarabhaṭṭa, he left Kerala for good. It is said that Uddaṇḍa became a custodian of law in a Tamil village and that his former opponent Dāmodara was summoned as a witness in a quarrel between two villagers. Despite his unfamiliarity with the local language, Dāmodara proved himself to be a useful witness reproducing the sounds uttered in the quarrel verbatim![12] However no accurate information is available on the latter part of our author's life.

DATE

Uddaṇḍa's date can be ascertained only with reference to that of his contemporaries. It is more or less established that his patron-the great Mānavikrama of Calicut, ruled between M. E. 642-650/A.D. 1467-1475.[13] From the prologue of his MM it is known that the poet met his patron for the first time while the latter was attending the royal court.

The date of another contemporary scholar of our poet is also well-established. Cennās Nampūtirippāḍ who is said to have introduced Uddaṇḍa to his patron, was born in M. E. 603 A. D. 1428 as is mentioned in his Tantrasamuccaya.[14] Thus it may be seen that Uddaṇḍa lived during the middle of the 15th century A. D.

UDDAṆḌA—THE DIALECTICIAN

As is evident from the prologue of his play, Uddaṇḍa set out from his native place Lāṭapuram with a view to visiting lands and obviously in search of a suitable patron who would encourage him, recognising his merit. From a verse attributed to him it is gathered that he failed to get the desired encouragement from the Karnataka (Vijayanagar) king and that he has informed the king of his regret in a suggestive manner. It is suggested that the king need not worry about repaying poets since it is not with any expectation that they describe the beauties of nature.[15] Apparently seeking his fortune in Andhra, Kalinga and Cola capitals he came to Kerala and entered the court of Mānavikrama of Calicut where he was received with enthusiasm.

A glorious picture of his first meeting with his royal patron is handed down by tradition. It is believed that he was introduced to the king by Cennās Nampūtirippāḍ in the following lines: "Haven't you heard, O King Mānavikrama! about the great Brahmin scholar Uddaṇḍa possessing a power of composition capable of subduing the tumult and magnitude of the waters of Narmadā, splashed by the playful arms of the great Kārtavīrāyarjuna, coming to your land from the Tuṇḍīra region?"[16] Uddaṇḍa on his part presented the king with a verse which at once displayed the talents of the author. Beginning with the word 'uddaṇḍa' the verse is a panegyric upon the king wherein it is said 'that the flagstaff of the king in his marches of victory is soaring so high that it passes even the sun and that the tiger-sign of the flag drives away the deer on the moon enabling it to vie with the faces of the ladies of the harem and that the king may ward off this possibility'.[17] It is commonly agreed that the name Uddaṇḍa was given to the poet by his patron on account of this verse. It is explained that the word, occurring also in the introductory verse of Cennās Nampūtirippāḍ, means 'a great opponent to the partner in discussion.[18] Some suggest that the verse might have been dedicated by the author to the Cola king, whose emblem is tiger.[19]

His own account of the meeting is as follows: On entering the durbar hall of king Vikrama, he saw the king, occupying the throne and being fanned by the attendants. He praised the king likening him to the rain clouds that extinguish the heat of the valour of enemy kings and wishing longevity to, the king.[20] Then the king shifting his eyes from the faces of the court-poets looked at him and said: 'Oh great scholar Uddaṇḍa, listen to my words. You possess the great ability to compose good poetry. Please compose a Prakaraṇa entitled Mallikāmāruta and do me a favour'.[21] From this it is known that the work was composed at the instance of his patron.

As a court-poet and scholar Uddaṇḍa figured in many legends. His scholastic enterprises and discussions with the elite of the time is mainly known from the various legendary accounts. It is said that until the emergence of a worthy opponent in Dāmodarabhaṭṭa of Kākkaśśeri,Uddaṇḍa. dominated the scene of discussions annexing one prize after another. While he welcomed worthy opponents he has expressed his scorn for upstarts. He is said to have composed a verse on one Nāṇappa Piṣāroṭi-an old scholar of the time and an ancestor of the great Acyuta Piṣāroṭi of Ṭṛkkaṇṭiyūr-making it clear that he has no respect for the old one.[22] Of another upstart who tried to challenge Uddaṇḍa in Śāstraic discussions, he commented that 'the lion spending the days smashing the head of elephants does not heed the howl of jackals revelling in the burial ground'.[23]

It was Dāmodarabhaṭṭa of Kākkaśśeri who emerged as more than an equal in his scholastic enterprises. These two lions clashing for supremacy in the arena under the aegis of Mānavikrama of Calicut provided an interesting spectacle to the scholarly assembly. It is said in traditional accounts that Dāmodara was only twelve years old at that time and that he was carried by a servant to the discussion hall in the temple at Taḷi.[24] However it is clear that the Kerala scholar entered the arena at a remarkably young age.

On entering, the assembly hall he announced that he has no parasol, no horse, no attending bards, no moustache, no costly clothes given as presents or any gaudy dress; but he has considerable command over words splashing like the waves of the milky ocean churned by the Mandara mountain'.[25] To this Uddaṇḍa reacted sharply announcing that 'if a scholar well-versed in the art of discussion is there, he is welcome to the assembly ; does the king of reptiles become afraid of a little water-snake?[26] Dāmodara again submitted that he has 'studied the Vedas with its numerous hymns, tried at composing poetry, worked in Nyāya philosophy, resorted to grammatical studies, taken trouble to master the Vaiśeṣika system, scrutinised both the schools of Mīmāmsā, analysed the Sāṅkhya system, mastered the Smṛti texts, familiarised the course of the Purāṇas and performed the Yoga practices'[27]. Then he challenged Uddaṇḍa 'to grammatically ascertain the formation of any word with reference to the etymological aspects, or if he prefers to choose some popular maxim from the more interesting Mīmāmsā system let him establish it, or he may sustain an illustration of syllogistic inference if he is inclined in the Nyāya system'.[28] Further Dāmodara asserted that he could 'establish in a few moments with proper illustrations and valid references before the assembly of scholars that a wrong proposition brought forward by an opponent is correct and vice versa; prove that an apparent, though unreal, means of valid knowledge is really true and vice versa and that an existing one as nonexistent and vice versa , for his deeds indeed are singular!'[29]. With these words the opponents clashed on various points of discussion. When Uddaṇḍa referred to the short stature of the young opponent as ākāro hrasvaḥ ' (the stature is short) the latter retorted saying that 'ākāra' is long obviously referring to the long vowel, raising a captious objection and went on explaining that it is the 'akārā' (the vowel) which is really short'—an incident narrated in connection with the story of Vedāntadeśika also. The patron tried to bring out the merit of the opponents asking them to explain the opening verse of the Raghuvaṁśa in which Uddaṇḍa offered four different interpretations and was easily outclassed by Dāmodara who gave ten different convincing explanations. It is needless to note that Uddaṇḍa was surprised by the sharp intelligence of the local scholar.

He caught his opponent off guard as controverting a sudden statement that your mother is chaste ' wherein the opponent is expected to contradict it. As soon as Dāmodara began to controvert saying 'No! No!' the frowning scholars of the assembly wanted him to explain his negation at the cost of his excommunication from the orthodox society. But undaunted by the trap the young dialectician quoted the fifth hymn of the twenty seventh section of the third chapter in the eighth Aṣṭaka of the Rgveda where it is maintained that man takes possession of his bride only as the fourth one in succession to Soma, Gandharva and Agni[30] and extricated himself from the tight corner emerging victorious in the day's discussion.

On another occasion Uḍḍaṇḍa boasted that he is equally proficient in both literature and music. Dāmodara countered with the statement that 'a tiny berry-seed can boast of that in emerald there is no redness, in ruby there is no blueness, whereas in it both these colours are present.'[31] Thus Dāmodara could easily establish his superiority and thereafter he annexed the various prizes in discussions to the great gratification of the native scholars who felt that their prestige is restored.

THE EIGHTEEN AND A HALF POETS

It is well-known that Mānavikrama was a great patron of scholars emulating the great Bhoja, figuring himself as the hero in many a literary work composed by the reputed poets of his royal court. The group of these scholars consisted of eighteen or nineteen men of extraordinary genius. Some of them were poets of great repute while others were erudite scholars.

The academy of scholars consisted of nine members of the famous Payyūr family including the seniormost member, his seven brothers and his son; five Nampūṭiri Brahmins of the Tiruvegappura (Aśokapura) region, Mullappaḷḷi Bhaṭṭatiri, Cennās Nampūtirippāḍ, Uddaṇḍa and Kākkaśśeri Dāmodarabhaṭṭa. It is said that Punam Nampūtiri was considered only as a 'half-poet' because of his status as a poet of the Malayalam language. The concord was headed by the seniormost member of the Payyūr family, who it is said, did not permit the well-known Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭa himself to occupy a prominent seat in the assembly and was constrained even to allow him a seat in the corner of the discussion hall.[32] Some doubt whether all these scholars did flourish at the royal court at the same time, or it is only a legend sanctified by the number 'eighteen and a half' applied to other academies like the Taḷis as also the Saṅghakkaḷi troupes.[33]

However it is certain that Uddaṇḍa did occupy an important position in the assembly. Some of these scholars have been referred to by him in his works while some others have been referred to in his Muktakas. Among the 19 writers constituting the concord only a few are known to have left their imprints on the literature of Kerala.

Payyūrbhaṭṭas

The famous Nampūtiri family of Payyūr is situated in Ponkunnam near Guruvāyūr in the Kunnamkulam Taluk of the erstwhile Cochin state.[34] It is believed that nine members of this famous family have adorned the court of Mānavikrama at the same time. As to their identity there is some uncertainty. According to some they consisted of the seniormost member, his seven brothers and his son.[35] While the senior member's name is not known, the son is called Parameśvara and he is credited with the authorship of the Jaimīniyasūtrārtha samgraha. It is this father and son who have been referred to by Uddaṇḍa in his works. It is further maintained that the term Ṛṣi generally applied to the senior member does not constitute a proper name at all and that it refers to the name of the house usually with reference to which the Nampūtiris are known. Thus Ṛṣi is the Sanskritised form of 'Iraṭi'-a house name and that it is applied to all members of the Payyūr family alike.[36]

According to another view, in the second half of the 14th century A. D. there lived Ṛṣi I to whom was born Parameśvara I, the author of the two commentaries on Vācaspatimiśra's Nyāyakaṇikā called the Juṣadhvamkaraṇi and the Svaditamkaraṇi. He is also credited with the authorship of the Sumanoramaṇi, a commentary on the Meghadūta. Parameśvara I had five children known as Ṛṣi II, Bhavadāsa, Vāsudeva, Subrahmaṇya and Śaṅkara. Ṛṣi II married Gopālikā and got the son Parameśvara II who has commented on the Vibhramaviveka and the Sphoṭasiddhi of Maṇḍanamiśra, the Tattvabindu of Vācaspatimiśra and the Nītitattvāvirbhāva of Cidānandapaṇḍita. Parameśvera II was the father of Ṛṣi III whose son is called Parameśvara III. Among these scholars Parameśvara II and his father Ṛṣi II were the members who flourished in Mānavikrama's court.[37]

Uddaṇḍa refers to the seniormost member, whom he calls Maharṣi, as residing in Porkkaḷam (Raṇakhaḷa), and remarks that he is well-versed in the two branches of the Mīmāmsā philosophy-Pūrva and Uttara. The house of the scholar has attracted the elite of the time who came for discussions. The Maharṣi's disquisitions like commenting on Śāstraic works, explaining the Purāṇic lores or entering into discussions with scholars are mentioned by our poet. It is further suggested that Uddaṇḍa would like to show his KS to the Maharṣi to ensure it a lasting reputation.[38] According to a story handed down by tradition the Maharṣi failed to sustain a definition given by him during the dialectical discourses with our poet, who, out of respect for the Kerala scholar requested him to try again. But the Maharṣi stood his ground and refused to give a different definition.[39] In the Mallikāmāruta also he is referred to as a great Vedic scholar who has extended considerable assistance to our poet.[40] Though there is no work preserved to posterity as written by the Maharṣi, a reference to him in a Muktaka by our poet enables one to know that he was a poet of high calibre being likened to Kāḷidāsa, besides possessing qualities like omniscience and of a bestower of gifts.[41] The high esteem shown by Uddaṇḍa to his respected friend is corroborated by the glowing tributes of a contemporary scholar Dāmodara who refers to the Maharṣi by the terms like 'firmly attached to the pursuit of Vedic lore', 'pastmaster in versification', and 'the ornament of the land of Kerala.'[42]

The son of the great Ṛṣi known as Parameśvara was also a distinguished scholar of the period as is known by the reference in the MM where he is mentioned as the 'Mīmāmsakacakravarti' -an emperor in the domain of the Mīmāmsā philosophy.[43] Uddaṇḍa also cites in his Prakaraṇa a testimonial given to him by the junior scholar of Payyūr family. Parameśvara has remarked that Uddaṇḍa astonishes everybody by his proficiency in Vedas, astuteness in Nyāya philosophy, sharp-wittedness in Śāstras, dexterity in arts, accomplishment in versification and eloquence in the six languages besides being the target of praise in good poetical compositions.[44] The testimonial aptly sums up the astonishing ability of our poet.

It is said that once Uddaṇḍa happened to visit the family, obviously tired after a long journey. There he was treated to a sumptuous meal consisting of rice-gruel and other cereals. He was so pleased with the tasty food of the Keralites that he composed a verse on the subject then and there summing up its various ingredients and extolling the many qualities of the food.[45]

Dāmodarabhaṭṭa

Better known to the Keralites as Kakkāśśeri, Dāmodarabhaṭṭa was a scholar of supreme ability. Though he is not mentioned by the name in the works of Uddaṇḍa, he figures in many legends which connect him with our poet. There is a well-known story relating to his birth. It is said that the Nampūtiri scholars of the time felt ashamed in seeing Uddaṇḍa claiming the prizes one after another in every session of the assembly of discussion, namely Bhaṭṭadaña (better known as Paṭṭattānam), held in the temple at Taḷi under the aegis of Mānavikrama. They persuaded Uddaṇḍa and extracted a promise from him that he will enlist himself for participating in the discussion only after an interval of twelve years-the minimum period for enlisting scholars. Learning that a lady or the Kākkaśśeri house is pregnant, certain scholars proficient in Vedic formulas performed sacred rites to enable the child in the womb to be born with extraordinary abilities of intellect and as a result was born a boy named Dāmodara. The legend indirectly hints at the stature of Uddaṇḍa as a colossus among contemporary scholars. Dāmodara's encounters for supremacy with our poet have already been noted. Besides several Muktakas, Dāmodara is credited with the authorship of a drama called the Vasumatīmānavikrama in seven acts, in which his royal patron figures as the hero.

Cennās Nampūtiri

Another scholar of the period about whom we know something is Cennās Nārāyaṇan Nampūtiri, the author of the famous Tantric treatise

Tantrasamuccaya. It is definitely known from the work that he was born in M. E 603/A. D. 1428. The first part of the name refers to his house which is located in Vanneri in the Ponnani taluk. He is believed to have been a great personal friend of Uddaṇḍa and that it is he who introduced our poet to his patron, as is mentioned earlier. A native of Jayantamaṅgalam he has had occasions to befriend our poet who is supposed to have had matrimonial relation with a Nair lady of the Mārakkara house located in the region. The fact that Uddaṇḍa commanded great respect from his colleague is borne out by the inclusion of the two verses composed by Uddaṇḍa in the Tantrasamuccaya.[46] The verses under reference are included in the 10th Paṭala of the work wherein it is ordained that ladies should follow the deity in the sacred procession for bath on conclusion of festival, carrying lamps. Jayantamaṅgalam the abode of his friend and that of his consort, is constituted as the destination of the messenger in his KS. It is also suggested that the spot is made holy by the presence of pious Brahmins obviously keeping in mind the Nampūtiri friend of the author.

Thus we have accounted for twelve members of the assembly consisting of the nine members of the Payyūr family, Cennās Nampūtiri, Kākkaśśeri Dāmodara and Uddaṇḍa all of whom are traditionally connected together. The five Nampūtiri scholars of Tiruvegappura and Mullapaḷḷi Bhaṭṭatiri who complete the concord are shrouded in obscurity, nothing definite being known about them. There is a legend about Mullappalli Bhaṭṭatiri that he was given a punishment for spreading a scandal about his patron in the form of claiming the prize for discussion as the first one in the presence of more enlightened scholars who are made to wait by this unworthy act.[47] He is not known to have written any work.

Punam Nampūtiri

The famous author of Bhāṣārāmāyaṇa Campū known by the family name of Punam is said to have been a member of the assembly and that he was considered only a half-poet on account of his writing in Malayalam. Though he is not credited with any Sanskrit work as yet, it is evident from the Campū that he was equally proficient in Sanskrit also. Though Uddaṇḍa has not referred to him in his works, there are traditional stories which connect them together. According to one Muktaka attributed to Uddaṇḍa, he has expressed his disapproval of the vernacular poets in his inimitable style that 'the vernacular poets may be likened to the moon which is often of incomplete circle (also metre) and in the light of the sun, without rays or sparkle'.[48] But in respect of Punam, Uddaṇḍa was all praise. Punam, a native of Kolattunāḍ, migrated from there and entered the court of Mānavikrama presenting the king with a Maṇiprāvāḷa verse in praise of him.[49] Nearing the end of the verse the word of exclamation 'hanta' is used in a very appropriate manner so that Uddaṇḍa who was present on the occasion was overwhelmed with joy and admiration and presented the author with his upper garment saying that the use of the word deserves it. Further, he has expressed his appreciation of Punam saying : 'let the great poets of Kerala compose poetry, whom I won't praise; but Punam with his flood of words capable of horripilating I praise again and again'.[50] According to one story while Uddaṇḍa was worshipping in the Taḷi temple,[51] he composed the first three lines of an extraordinary verse with peculiar choice of words ending with a question as to how it could be construed as a praise of the god, obviously, throwing a challenge to the Nampūtiri Brahmins occupying the platform before the sanctum sanctorum.[52] Punam, who was occupying the platform along with some others promptly completed the stanza giving the answer by suggestion couched in words which threw back a question at the face of Uddaṇḍa who had deliberately added the consonant 'ṇa' six times to words which otherwise seemed appropriate to the occasion representing a praise to the god.[53] Punam who countered with a question, suggested the answer that without the six 'ṇa' the verse represents the praise and at the same time ridiculed its author as to how he failed to find the answer. Though Punam does not refer to Uddaṇḍa or to his works in his Campū he has quoted a verse attributed to the former by tradition.[54]

Before concluding the reference to the eighteen-and-a-half-poets of the court of Mānavikrama it may be pointed out that the term 'Patinettarakkavikal' had been explained in a different way. Obviously taking the position that it is impossible to have a half-poet it is suggested that the term 'Arakkavi' may be a derivative of 'Araśukavi or Rājakavi' meaning a poet of the royal court.[55] Thus the term may stand for eighteen poets of the royal court excluding Punam.

OTHER CONTEMPORARIES

Besides these poets who are supposed to have flourished under the patronage of Mānavikrama, there must have been a large number of poets who attracted the attention of Uddaṇḍa by their talents. There are various legends which attribute the friendship of Uddaṇḍa with several such poets and some of them have been mentioned by our author in his works.

SAṄKARAKAVI also known as Śankara Vāriyar a native of Kolattunāḍ, who was the protege of king Kerala Varma of Kolam and a poet of considerable merit is referred to by Uddaṇḍa in his KS while describing the route for his messenger. Uddaṇḍa refers to his poetical gift and extraordinary command over the choice of words saying that the region is habited by kings of poets like Śaṅkara whose gift of words is beyond praise or limit.[56] The observation is corroborated by a similar remark contained in the Candrotsava, a maṇipravāḷa work where the author refers to Śaṅkara in glowing terms, particularly to the incessant flow of words and meanings.[57] It is to be assumed that Uddaṇḍa had a genuine respect for the Kerala author. The work which must have attracted Uddaṇḍa and extracted from him an unreserved praise for its author is undoubtedly the Śrīkṛṣṇavijaya kāvya in 12 cantos describing the story of the 10th skandha or the Bhāgavata.

ĀNAYATTU KARUṆĀKARA PIṢĀROṬI, the author of a commentary on the Vṛttaratnākara styled the Kavicintāmaṇi is supposed to have been a contemporary of Uddaṇḍa and he is said to have earned the praise of Uddaṇḍa by completing a stanza composed by the latter.[58] According to another view the poet who completed the verse is one Karuṇākara Mārār who is different from the author of the Kavicintāmaṇi[59]. It is said that while Uddaṇḍa was worshipping the goddess Kātyayāni of the temple of Mukkola referred to by him by the Sanskritised name Muktipuryālaya in his KS (1. 78) he composed the first half of a verse in praise of the deity in an inimitable style and that as the idea of the lines was complete in itself he felt a little embarrassed to complete it in the appropriate style.[60] To his surprise he beard the verse being completed by somebody standing near to him and turning back to the stranger asked him as to who was this great poet.[61] The polite reply was that he was a servant of the goddess.

NETRAṆĀRĀYAṆA better known to the Keralites by the respectful term Āḷvāñceri Tamprākkal a great scholar in Astrology is referred to by Uddaṇḍa in his KS. (1. 77) as living on the banks of Nīḷā, purifying the region by his great qualities. Netranārāyaṇa has composed a Malayalam commentary on the Muhūrtapadavī besides causing Keḷallūr Nīlakaṇṭha Somayāji to comment on the Āryabhaṭīya. The latter had acknowledged the fact, referring to his patron by the term Netrānārayaṇa.

KUṬALLŪR NAMPŪTIRI—s also figure in various legends connected with the scholastic pursuits of Uddaṇḍa. This renowned family of Nampūtiri Brahmins have produced scholars for several generations, grammatical studies being their speciality. It is said that once while Uddaṇḍa was visiting the family, the senior Nampūtiri scholar of the house asked him whether he has studied the Padamañjarī, a commentary on the Kāśikā. Uddaṇḍa in reply asked the Nampūtiri to have it written down by some scribe and himself began to recite the whole text forthwith and won the challenge whereby extracting an apology from the Kerala scholar.[62]

On another occasion Uddaṇḍa was asked whether he would be willing to stay with the family teaching the youngsters. He declined the offer with a characteristic remark ' how could he find pleasure in teaching literature while he is amusing himself proudly possessing a command of words spreading over the different fields of knowledge like Nyāya, Vyākaraṇa, Mīmāmsā etc; and capable of smashing the head of an opposing scholar in deliberations'.[63] It is agreed by one and all that these words were not boastful; in fact he had exhibited such talents on many occasions.

An oft quoted verse composed by Uddaṇḍa describing the life of the affluent Nampūtiri Brahmins is said to have been written by him while he was visiting the Kūṭallūr family. He praises the Keralites passing the rainy season in their houses having all amenities, in company with a virtuous wife, children and friends, extending hospitality to the worthy ones and listening to the stories of Rāghava and Kṛṣṇa-obviously referring to the Rāmāyaṇa and the Bhāgavata-with devotion.[64] As already pointed out the verse is seen quoted by Punam in his Rāmāyaṇa Campū.

UDAYA the author of the Mayūrasandeśa[65] and the Kaumudī, a commentary on the Locana of Abhinavagupta has referred to Uddaṇḍa in respectful terms. Udaya, while referring to the region Jayantamaṅgalam in his poem mentions the possibility of his messenger meeting with Uddaṇḍa. The poet tells his messenger that he is to hear, in case Uddaṇḍa a native of Tuṇḍīra region, the king of poets and the moon emerging from the milky ocean of poetry, is present there, a wonderful flow of words ashaming the splashing waves of the divine Ganges and surpassing the fragrance of the half-blown jasmine flowers.[66]

According to some, VĀSUDEVA-a Nampūtiri Brahmin of Mukkola who wrote a commentary styled Mārgadarśinī on the Viddhasālabhañjikā of Rājaśekhara received the title of 'Sāhityamalla' from Uddaṇḍa.[67] The colophon found at the end of each act of the work contains the title.

The traditions[68] that BĀLAKAVI the author of the Ratnaketūdaya was a contemporary and rival of Uddaṇḍa is doubtful and baseless, as also his presence at the court of king Mānavikrama.[69]

Thus it may be seen that Uddaṇḍa had created an indelible impression on contemporary scholars and the general public, and that he had enjoyed the patronage of a worthy patron of literature which he failed to get from the several countries where he tried his luck. The fact that he was impressed by the contemporary writers of Kerala and that he had considered them superior to outsiders in hospitality as well as humanity, is evident from the prologue of his drama where he says: 'Now that the moon of discernment possessed by the intelligentsia has been swallowed by the Rāhu of the Kali age, the other assemblies excelling only in showing ill will... it is a matter of gratification[70] for him to present his drama before the august assembly of Kerala scholars.'

UDDAṆḌA'S WORKS

Though several works have been attributed to Uddaṇḍa it is established beyond doubt that he has composed the Mallikāmāruta the Kokilasandeśa and a few Muktaka-s. His authorship regarding the Naṭāṅkuśa[70a] and the Svāticāṭu also known as the Svātīmuktaka, is doubtful.

Of these latter works, the Naṭāṅkuśa is a vehement criticism on Kūṭiyāṭṭam performances in which Sanskrit dramas are invariably adapted to suit the occasion. The Cākyār-s or the professional actors of the temple theatre of Kerala have freely introduced several innovations like making the Vidūṣaka to recite parodies-which are called Pratiślokas-to every verse spoken by the hero and sometimes he is made to speak several languages according to the nature of the characters in the play. Such a mode of enactment not sanctioned by Bharata in his Nāṭyaśāstra, has become the target of sharp criticism from the anonymous author. In all probability the author of the work must have been a Nampūtiri scholar who resent the unlimited freedom enjoyed by the Kerala actors in presenting popular Sanskrit dramas.

The Svātīmuktaka is a eulogy on a queen belonging to the Kottayam royal family. The work has been published for the first time by Ulloor

S. Prameswara Iyer.[71] According to the editor the authorship of the work is to be attributed to Uddaṇḍa who has explained that the term 'Svātināma kṣitipatisutā' occurring in the KS (1.47) means a princess born to a king born in the star Svāti.[72] Further the tradition that Kottayam kings usually marry Nair ladies suggests that the Svāti referred to by Uddaṇḍa must also be a Nair lady. It is argued that the term 'Puraḷīśavaṁśa' in the Muktaka verse suggests that the heroine was a queen of the royal family and obviously a Kṣatriya lady. Thus both the girls belong to different castes. The fact that Uddaṇḍa simply refers to her beauty while the author of the Muktaka brings out her versatility in various arts is adduced as additional evidence to prove that the heroine of Uddaṇḍa and of the author of the Muktaka are different. Further, the terms like 'svātīm mama preyasīm', 'kānte svāti' etc., suggest that the husband of the princess might be the author, who according to the custom prevalent in the family must be a Nampūtiri Brahmin. On the whole it is safe to assume that the author of the Muktaka is some one else than Uddaṇḍa.

The Mallikāmāruta

This Prakaraṇa in ten acts written on the model of the Mālatīmādhava of Bhavabhūti may be considered as the touch-stone that brings out the myriadfold ability of Uddaṇḍa in versification, erudite conception and flight of imagination.[73] From the prologue of the play it is known that he was requested by his patron to compose the work, thereby showing an act of favour. It is also known that the play was put on the stage for the first time before the august audience assembled in the discussion hall before the temple of Taḷi referred to as 'Śrīsthaliśvarasya sannidhānam'. The fact that the author had a high esteem for his work is revealed by his reference to it as the 'prakaraṇatilaka'. The work contains some personal details about the author like his coming over to Kerala having visited almost all prominent royal courts in the South in search of a worthy patron, and his great satisfaction in coming to Calicut as if by a divine providence after suffering various tribulations and vagaries.[74]

The story of the play may be summarised as follows:- Māruta was born as the son Mañjulā the daughter of Maṇidhara-a minister of the Nāga king and of a Malaya youth who was the minister of Kāmadeva. He was brought up in the mountain regions of the Malaya in the south by Sage Agastya and his wife Lopāmudrā. In due course he fell in love with Mallikā the daughter of Viśvāvasu the minister of the Vidyādhara king and they were united in wedlock. Before long a serious calamity fell on them. A picture board held by Māruta slipped away from his hands and to his horror it fell on the head of a sage called Sulabhamanyu. The angry sage pronounced a curse on the couple as a result of which both had to lose their divinity and to take birth as human beings. Thus Māruta was born as the son of Brahmadatta the minister of the Kuntala king while Mallikā became the daughter of one Viśvāvasu of Kusumapura. At last they were united again by a female ascetic called Mandākinī.

The indebtedness of Uddaṇḍa to the Mālatīmādhava is evident as the story more or less follows that of Bhavabhūti. There are instances in the play where the author has imitated his worthy predecessor in the formation of the plot, in characterisation and in the description. Even the names of some of the characters and places are identical at times, Mandākinī being an instance. Still no one could dismiss the work as a worthless imitation of a well-known play. The author has shown a wonderful sleight of hand in handling his theme. Śṛṅgāra the main sentiment, is delineated in all its wonderful charm and varieties, in union as well as in separation. The term 'Sambandha' applied to the matrimonial alliance of the hero and the heroine in the sixth act of the play betrays the familiarity of the author with the social custom of his adopted land. It must be admitted that in spite of its great charm the stage effect of the play is rather doubtful.

The Kokilasandeśa:

The beautiful lyric in 162 verses is one of the best Sandeśa kāvya-s produced in Kerala. The author assumes the role of the hero and sends a message to his consort living in the Mārakkara house of Cennamaṅgalam. The messenger, who is a Kokila, is asked to go to Kerala from Toṇḍamaṇḍalam in the Madras State which is the native place of the poet. The work affords an occasion to the author to describe various places of interest like shrines and rivers and to refer to various celebrities of the time with whom he had been in good relations.

Muktakas

A number of Muktakas are attributed to Uddaṇḍa, most of which were obviously composed after his coming over to Kerala. It is to be noted that many of these are improptu verses composed on the spur of the moment. The salient features of these are: the exhibition of his astonishing skill in improvisation, the knowledge of the nature, the close first hand contact with the social life of Kerala, the scorn for poetasters, the respect for real scholarship and an undercurrent of essential humility despite the apparent arrogance.

Some of these Muktakas have already been noticed. Tradition has handed down some more which may be noticed here.

His challenge to the poetasters of the land announcing his arrival on the literary scene is famous. He compares himself to a lion roaming in the forest of philosophy likening the poetasters to elephants, thereby suggesting his superiority.[75] In another verse he ridicules them since they boast of themselves by composing a few lines, comparing them to bad weavers who could make only rags. He admits that his tongue is ashamed even to retort to them despite its command over words rushing forth like the tumultuous waves of the heavenly Ganges.[76]

Once Uddaṇḍa happened to visit the temple at Ūrakam dedicated to goddess Pārvatī popularly known as Valayādhiśvarī at about noon time while he was on a journey. Being fatigued by hunger and thirst he was expecting to get some food which the temple usually provides for wayfarers, especially Brahmins. To his disappointment, he could not have it since the feeding time was already over. Reflecting on the situation he composed a verse on the goddess to mean: ' Your husband holds a skull (as a vagabond holding a potsherd), your father is hard-hearted (who is none other than the the rocky Himavān) and the name of your mother is Menā (split as me na meaning 'I have nothing'); oh goddess you are Valayālayasthā (dwelling in an empty house), then how can one expect munificence from you !'[77]

On another occasion while he was visiting the temple at Tali he found the door of the inner shrine closed for ritualistic purposes. He noticed a temple servant sounding a double-drum called 'Iṭakka' producing a peculiar rhythmic sound which stirred up his poetic impulse and he composed a verse in praise of his patron with the same rhythmic pattern.[78] The verse is a demonstration of his great skill in improvisation and perhaps unique in the whole range of Sanskrit literature.

Oṇam (Śrāvaṇa) festival falling in the months of August-September, an occasion of merriment to the Keralites, has attracted him and he has composed a verse on it. In the verse he refers to the merriment of the boys striking the festival bows, the enjoyment of the married couples and the haste of husbands in purchasing various clothes for their consorts.[79] As already pointed out he has also composed a verse on the gruel made of rice- a popular cereal of the Keralites. Yet another verse on the subject is attributed to him where he has compared the various qualities of rice-gruel to those of a beautiful maiden.[80]

Another verse attributed to the poet is a burst of vehement condemnation of the brother-in-law of his patron, in which it is said that the oppressive measures resorted to by the former stem from his position as the relative of the ruler of the land and not from the might of his arms.[81] Yet another verse written by him is in praise of the various qualities of an young areca-nut widely used in Kerala by both men and women for chewing with betel leaves.[82] It is likely that the author used to chew betel leaves- a habit probably acquired after he came to this region.

KOKILASANDEŚA – A RESUME

I

The lover falls asleep after enjoying conjugal bliss with his consort in his lofty apartment. Suddenly he wakes up and finds that he is separated from her and is left on the banks of Kampā in Kāñcī, the abode of Pārvatī. A voice is heard that he was separated by the celestial nymphs of the city of Varuṇa, the lord of waters, who came over there to worship the deity and that the command of the attendant compelled them to leave him there and that a sojourn of five months on the holy spot would ensure a lasting reunion with his beloved. Heeding to the anonymous advice he decides to live there and after two or three months rendered longer by the agony of separation, he meets with a Kokila enjoying, the tender twigs of a mango tree made attractive by the advent of the vernal season. Approaching the bird cooing sweet notes, reminding him of his beloved, he addresses it offering his tears.

"Welcome my friend ! I feel relieved by your presence since you know the pangs of lovers in separation. Don't get worried till my tongue shakes away its rigidity and entrusts you with a message. Take it to my beloved and console her; a message from the lover brought by a friend is a life-saver to women in separation."

Then the lover describes the destination and route in detail. The bird has to go to Jayantamaṅgalam on the banks of Cūrṇī in Kerala made affluent by the cool nectar-sweet glances of the Goddess of riches, where he will meet with the lady-the most charming one among her class-suffering the agony of separation. The celestial nymphs returning to Varuṇapura in the west in their heavenly cars will accompany the messenger almost to the destination enjoying his sweet melodies. The breeze coming forth from the gardens on the banks of Kampā carrying sweet fragrance will be agreeable to him. Before his departure he is to worship at the holy temple of Viṣṇu, the lord of Kāñcī on the hillock of Karigiri where the doves resting on the thatch resemble the smoke from the sacrificial fire lit by Brahman in the distant past. He is to worship the Kāmapīṭha of Kāñcī the greatest among the eighteen pīṭhas, on the banks of the Kampā where the supreme deity is present herself, at whose blessing the wealth of poetry is enriched in the 'Tuṇḍīra region. Moving to the right he will find the sacred mango tree known as Ekāmra on whose beautiful shade Lord Śiva with the crescent moon, Valayāṅka, stays forgetful of his worthy Kailāsa. When he flies up the bewitching beauty of Kāñcī as seen from the sky is likely to hold up his journey; hence he is to be careful.

Going to the west on his swift wings he will see the river Kṣīrasindhu (Pālār) fringed by betels and areca trees on the banks and over which the black bees intoxicated by the honey of the lotuses hover about. His flight over the river will produce a blue line on it lending the semblance of the blue Yamuna to the Kṣīrasindhu. Charming Dramiḍa ladies bearing the beads of water bubbles on their breasts and wearing ornaments appear on its banks and the lover foresees delay on the part of the messenger for a while. To the right of the river he will see the village settlements with ponds made holy by the baths of Brahmins, trees darkened by the sacrificial smoke and houses reverberating with the chants of Vedic hymns. Such scholarship in Vedas, such mastery over all the ancient scientific lore and such an undiminished flair for pure poetry are in short, the characteristics of the residents of the locality and the parrots on the nearby trees will testify them.

Dr. Urmila Sharma Collection, Varanasi

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

Passing over the region, satiating the glances of the Coḷa maidens who behold him with raised necks he is to enter Vilvakṣetra, the abode of Śiva, which will welcome him by the flags fluttering in the breeze of the Nīvā river. He is not to be afraid of the god who had burnt Cupid; there is a spring of mercy on the left lap of the god, black in colour, sweet in words and tremulous in glances milking the desires. The gardens of the region will accord him a royal welcome; he is the companion of the Vasanta the vernal season. The courtesans coming out of the arbours bathed in sweat at the end of the conjugal sports will be grateful to him for the breeze provided by the soft wings.

Crossing the Cola country he is to see the forest regions darkened by the eyes of the flashing deer and woods proclaiming the conjugal sports of the hill tribes with creeper-beds and broken berry-seed ornaments. There he will be attracted by the golden mango sprouts and dancing peacocks, who take him for the raincloud coupled with lightning.

At a distance he will see the river Kāverī springing forth from the Sahya mount, where the swans come down on its waves bearing semblance to an elephant in rut and on whose middle he is to see Raṅganātha as an emerald to the necklace of the mother Earth. On its banks lining with hamlets filled by the fragrance of garden trees he will find the Hosala region, where he will observe the temple of Murāri known as Lakṣmīnārāyaṇapuram, the courtesans of which are apt to ensnare even Cupid with their smiles.

Then he is to climb the Sahya mountain, renowned for the tinkling sound of celestial's ornaments, and in whose slopes the leader of the Bhārgavas presents himself relenting from the slaughter of the Kṣatriya clan having gifted the entire land to Brahmins. Having worshipped Lord Viṣṇu at the Tirunelli temple he is to come down to see the arecanut fringed land of Kerala-the creation of the mighty arms of Paraśurāma. If he has enough merit he would visit the temple of Śiva (at Cerumannam) who stormed the sacrifice of Dakṣa, alongside of which goddess Bhadrakāḷī also is to be seen riding a lion and holding a sharp trident piercing the demon Dāruka. He is to fly over the regions for a while, bathing in the tiny shreds of water splashed by the nearby falls, cdoing his sweet melodies to convince the temple servants that he is not a crow.

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

After worshipping Lord Śiva he is to proceed to the capital of the Puraḷi kings crowded with sky scrapers which compel stars to raise their course, being drawn by the glances of the Kerala maidens on his way. It is in this royal line that the famous king Hariścandra was born ; it is they who popularised the Mīmāmsā philosophy of the Kumāriḷa school in this land; to the destruction of whose enemy in battle Goddess Caṇḍikā presents herself; the praise of whom makes the tongue purified. The garden surrounding the locality is likely to quench his fatigue. In case the Svātī princess comes there to worship the god to the accompaniment of the tinkling of the girdles holding the hands of her maids, she is sure to learn a lesson from him in sweet sounds. If he could sprinkle the honey drops of the flowers on her with his beak when she comes there, a little bent with the weight of the heavy breasts, sprouts of sweat lining her face and fatigued by the heavy hips, he will receive her grateful glances enchanted by the dancing eyebrows.

Though the destination is further to the south in his errand he may go still to the west, for if one fails to visit the Sampadgrāma sanctified by the presence of Śiva, one's life is rendered worthless. Entering the lofty temple of Śiva which discards the glory of the silver mount Kāilasa, he is to enjoy the fanning of the Brahmins resting on its corridors after having their routine salutations. For a while he may worship the god offering praise and remain there till the evening when he will see the dances of the god glorified by the glances of his consort. The charming maidens attending the evening procession holding golden bowls close to their breast will find him reflected in them giving the semblance of the rising moon with the dark shadow. When the darkness sets in as though the blueness of the neck of the god has spread out, he may find accommodation in some tree top for the night. The cool breeze coming from the Western Ocean with the fragrance of the waterlilies will soothe him to sleep. When the rising sun spreads his purple rays he is to resume the journey. The sight of the Cakravāka maiden afflicted with love will remind him of his duty and hasten him. Having worshipped Lord Kṛṣṇa in the nearby Śambara temple he is to leave for the region of Kola fragrant with cardamom plantations, where the great poets like Śaṅkara whose glory is beyond words, reside.

Going again through the shores of the ocean, the birth place of winds, seeing the boats approaching in flocks as though the mountains are coming up with wings, he is to move along being looked upon by the fair ones with respect. The famous city of Kukkuṭakroḍa with its sky-scrapers and protected by the brave Kṣatriya-s of the royal line will please his eyes; where in every house there is the white-washed balcony on which the couples revel. The ocean, the father of the goddess of riches, seeing that his daughter has settled down in the city, is embracing the place presenting it with shipfuls of jewels.

Passing over the balconies and crossing villages he is to reach Veṭṭattunāḍ the enlightened region which has driven away the Kali effects by the practice of the Vedic lore, where he will visit Śvetāraṇya the abode of Mṛtyuñjaya-a visit which ensures the luck of avoiding the grim eyebrows of the god of death. He must worship the feet of the lord reddened by the kick dealt to the chest of the god of death and as a result caressed by the hands of Pārvatī-the feet which pressed the mountain down to render the king of Rākṣasa-s wailing helplessly with his series of mouths, his hands having been crushed under it.

Nearby flows the Niḷā resembling the Ganges fallen down from the matted locks of the god during his evening dances, on the banks of which there is the temple of Nāvā consecrated to Lord Viṣṇu along with Lakṣmī. When the Kerala damsels crowd along with their lovers to witness the Mahāmāgha festival, having enjoyed the fragrance of the heroine who come along, the black bees even now refuse to kiss the lotus. The river with its beds almost dry, the lotus surrounded by the moss, the swans flirting on the sandbanks and made slender by the scorching rays of the sun, is likely to resemble the heroine with curly locks falling on her face and girdle slipping down from her loins.

In case god Śāstā of Śambarakroḍa goes on a hunt riding a swift horse through the banks, the Kokila may remove his beads of sweat with the flapping of wings producing breeze; even the slightest help rendered in time will count with the great. It is renowned that the Brahmins of Kerala are the greatest in the world, especially those who live between the rivers Vallī and Kauṇī and even there those who live where the Niḷā flows, are wonderful. Even the preceptor of gods could not praise them adequately; let alone the words of the hero.

Passing her and leaving behind the sweet mango groves the messenger is to reach the holy regions of Netranārāyaṇa. There he must worship the feet of goddess Kātyāyanī of Muktipuryālaya which crushed the demon Mahiṣa; the feet once tenderly placed on the slab of stone by her husband during the marriage ceremony.

A little to the east of Raṇakhaḷa he will see the sacred residence of Maharṣi, the patron-saint of the two Mīmāmsā-s, Pūrva and Uttara, where the scholars coming for discussions invariably meet with parrots in the discussion hall in all eagerness. Be it the exposition of the Śāstras or the Purāṇic lore or the reception of visitors or the conversation with scholars, the sweet melodies of Kokila resting on a nearby arbour will attract him and he will be only happy to hear him. If he happens to see the messenger entrusted with a task by the hero, as though a poetical work abounding in rhythm, meanings and sounds, then the journey ahead is faultless. The Kokila is to start from his side and is to be greeted by the breeze carrying the fragrant foam from the mouth of the divine bull of Śiva and scented with the touch of the wavy locks of Pārvatī sporting on the lap of her husband consecrated at Vṛṣapurī (Trichur). There the god has assumed a twin body to see the back and front parts of his consort simultaneously ; he was confused at seeing the front part bent with the heavy breasts and the back without the hips or wavy locks. The skulls of Brahman, adorning his head enlivened by the touch of the nectar oozing from the crescent moon melted by the burning eye of the forehead being fanned by the breathing of his ornamental snakes, remove the doubts of Brahmins chanting Vedic hymns in the Maṇḍapa before the temple. Close to that there is the shrine of Pārvatī, the court-yard of which is attended by the lords of the quarters who have enriched themselves by the glances of Aṇimā the divine power guarding the door. Verily she is the mother of the Universe.

Flying up and reaching the sky darkened by the tails of peacock adorning the head of Viṣṇu of Samgamagrāma, feeling himself at home among the foliage, for a moment the people of the locality will fail to distinguish him. He is to reach the temple of Kāḷī attended by gods for worship where the attendants of the deity pull the buffalo of Yama by the rope and horns in an attempt to sacrifice it before the deity and Vijayā the maid interferes with a smile.

Before him he will see the city of Añjanakhaḷa the abode of Śiva where the flags fluttering on the towers fan the horses of the sun and the breeze from the Cūṛṇī wipe the fatigue away from the faces of the tired city damsels. He must see the river itself, the red lotuses of which looking like the blue ones tinged by the musk washed away from the neck of the city girls of Mahodayapuram and distinguished only in the morning sun when they bloom forth. Pure, crystal clear, fish-eyed, with Cakravāka breasts, with lotus face, wavy brows and mossy locks she is sweet to all who approach her with favour, but to others she is different; a characteristic of all that is deep. When he hovers above the river the bees seeing his reflection on waves resembling the bunches of blue lotuses, hum forth with sweet notes. Reaching the southern banks he will see the place called Jayantamaṅgalam in all prosperity that discard the glory of the city of gods. With gardens, arbours, lakes flocked by bees that are shaken away from lotuses by the swans, and with jewel-studded city gates the place is easy to traverse without any further direction.

II

The second part begins with a description of the glory of the city. Lord Viṣṇu has preferred this city to the ocean because it has produced Lakṣmī (prosperity) jewels and the rising moon. The resemblance of the face to the rising moon pointed out by the lovers tempt the city maidens to cast their jealous eyes capable of instructing the blue lotuses at the moon and tarnish it with black mark. The pathways studded with emerald reflecting the image of Kokila shed a darkness prevailing over the rays of the sun and give the courtesans a chance to court their lovers even in day time. The wound received -by the moon from the tip of the flagstaff in his attempt at stealing the beauty of the city maidens leave a dark patch on him and the ignorant world confuse it for hare, deer and the like. The horses of the sun mistake the emerald rays rising forth from the moon-stone balconies for the moss thrown out by the waves of the heavenly Ganges and try to chew at it. The rain clouds entangled on the branches of the big trees like the flocks of black bees produce fragrant rain and fill, the nearby lakes.

The maids point out the reflection of the heroine on the crystal walls and confront her whether that is the one her lover has been alleged to have indulged with on that room and thus ashame her. Cupid throws away the staff of sugarcane, the brows serving the purpose of the bow; lotus in cast down, taking glances for the arrows ; the string of bees is rejected in favour of the lining hairs of the belly of women. The paramour seeing the partner with her locks fallen around, breasts shaking, knot of the loin clothes loose in the effort of swimming the ocean of love encourages them to resume the sports even when they are fatigued. The rain clouds hanging around the lofty balconies will go unnoticed if they desist from thundering and the lightning looks like the golden girdle slipping down from the hips of the damsels in their renewed attempt at love sports.

To the right of the shrine of Viṣṇu is the house of the heroine surrounded by jewel-walls in the centre of which there is the golden tower where Lakṣmī (prosperity) dances as in Lotus. The noble house is referred to by poets as Mārakkara taking the initial letters of the qualities Māhābhāgya (great prosperity), Ratipatibhujāḍambara-(the renown for the might of Cupid), Kalyāṇaugha-(the assemblage of fortune), and Rasikānantatā - (the unlimited elegance), which characterize it. The pleasure tank full of crystal clear water with the flight of ruby steps producing the likeness of lotuses as the sunrays fall on them, is resorted to by the heroine for her bath, when the swans wait for her to learn the art of her gait. On its banks there is the mango tree flocked by Kokilas longing for the twigs and near to that stands the spring creeper Mādhavī both of which were united in wedlock by the heroine. Not far from it, is the Campaka with the golden trench and watered by dew drops, producing flowers of the same hue as that of the limbs of the heroine, having longed for her smile. The garden of sandal trees free from snakes owing to the presence of the dancing peacock contains the arbour with a jewel spot where the creeper of their love grew up. Close to that there is the Kuravaka surrounded by the humming black bees and producing buds of horripilation at the touch of the bands of the heroine. If she is not to be seen on those spots resting on a bed of flowers-and placing her shoulders on her maids, there is the emerald mansion where she is to be seen like a streak of lightning against the dark rain clouds. She is the collyrium of nectar, the essence of creation, the first digit of the elegant moon, the torch of the mighty Cupid and the crescent moon from the sea of love ; in short the hero's second life. Seeing her among the flood of beauty and amidst her maids how can he fail to recognise ? Does the moon shedding light all over the world is announced to any body because of his stance among the stars at night ? She is the creation of Cupid collecting together the various materials like the spotless and fragrant moon, a pair of golden hillocks, a piece of sky pinned down by a series of black bees, a beautiful disc, a pair of soft elephant trunk and a set of two dancing lotus. The careless glances from her shame the deer, the tremulous brows take away the pride of waves, the hands do not tolerate the supremacy of the tender sprouts of the Kalpavṛkṣa and her voice acquires juvenile friendship with his Pañcama note. That brilliance drives the gold; when compared to her the moon is nowhere; that sweetness of her lips lends bitterness to honey; the tender limbs reduce the jasmine to a hard metal and the thighs drive away the pride of the golden plantains.

The hero admits that his words dwell on the beauty of her limbs, for they can only reflect the workings of his mind. Now that he is far off from her side she might have become thinner anxiously passing the day long as a peacock tortured by the summer. The ear in which he used to place a red lotus out of love is now adorned by her tender lotus-hand placed in support of the pale face. The eyes that quiver when she looks at the hero who is separated from her by the fate, will be full of tears and will represent the miserable plight of the lotus drenched with dew drops. The lips which the hero had kissed at the finale of the conjugal sports with pleasure, dexterity, tenderness, love and eagerness, now bereft of the touch of smile of nectar will have become languid by the hot breath. A pair of hillocks for the Cupid to sport on, a couple of Cakravāka of the river of brilliance, the breasts must have become pale.

The hero fears that the separation will make her reject the star-like garlands and wear another made of tears. Despite the rejection of ornaments she wears the girdle which the hero had made stringing together the big pearls and Cupid takes the loins for his capital fortified by it. The pair of thighs which are verily the post to tie the elephant of his mind, is now tired under the weight of the heavy hips, the caressing of which had always resulted in countless pleasures and occasional hurdles. The tender lotus feet are tortured by going to and fro to the door in the expectation of the hero's return-the feet from which he used to get much desired kicks at the time of his prostration after deliberately calling her by a wrong name. Even if the fire of separation makes her emaciated, it surely increases her charm as the fire melting and reducing the quantity of gold lends a new brilliance to it. Surely she wears dust on her locks, tears on her eyelids, cheek in her hand, garland of lotus-stalks on her breasts and soiled clothes on her loins. It is indeed of no use to wail over and pass precious time.

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

Resting on a mango tree and eating the sprouts at will the Kokila is to behold her who will be politely asking the Malaya breeze about the tidings of the hero or requesting him to convey her news to the cruel one ; or consoling her friends, with a smile despite her agony, who ask her whether the sandal paste mixed with dew drops subsides the heat and the gentle breeze of the fan is agreeable; or commanding her maids to close the windows to ward off the Malaya breeze and to frighten the Cupid by uttering the names of Śiva and to let the partridge to graze the moon beams; Or entering the studio leaning on the arms of the maids, where, seeing the picture of the hero kneeling by her feet, approaching it with open arms to embrace it saying "enough of it, my beloved, please stand up; I am not angry " when the maids prevent her ; Or imagining herself to be the hero standing before her with folded hands uttering the words 'O angry one! don't be angry to your maids; the unexpected separation is caused by the fate ' and trying to console her; Or seeing the reflection of her face with locks loosely fallen on her cheek, on the crystal wall of the apartment as to who has brought in the moon surrounded by the clouds ; Or causing the lotus-eyes of the maids to fold up at the sight of her imaginary embrace of the hero lapsing somehow into sleep after a long time wherein the few bangles remaining on her hand is broken to pieces dashing against the breasts ; Or holding hopes for life listening to the sound of crow on the right side tree suggesting the arrival of a friend and feeling the quiver of the left eye and relaxation of the heart at the sound of the sweet melodies of the Kokila-s; Or ashamed and astonished that she lives without the one who is so dear and equal to life and consoling herself that the hope of reunion is the reason behind it ; for these are some of the fancies of ladies in separation.

The left hand which slips away from holding the hero's neck in sleep after the conjugal sports, though separated from the hero by the cruel fate will surely throb when the messenger reaches her side. His face announcing the message will not be seen at night and in day time till noon she is busy with her religious observances. When the rays of the sun is not too hot to bear, he is to convey the message to the heroine suffering intolerable agony resting himself on the jewel thatch of the house top.

Dr. Urmila Sharma Collection, Varanasi

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

"Has he come to convey any happy message leaving away the tender sprouts of the mango tree ?" Thinking on these lines and washing the eyes with water provided by her maids, she will look at him when he must begin to announce the message. "O virtuous lady! Your auspicious thread remains strong. I am a messenger coming from the side of your husband and born in the species of the sweet sounded Kokila-s who are the sixth arrow of Cupid aimed at wayfarers. Your husband remains in the Colas in good health and asks the well being of you". Before he could finish this he will be greeted by her glances and interrupted saying "tell me more and more". He is to continue that he is conveying the message of the lover who used to complain during transient periods of huff-a message of agreeable composition to the ears.

"O beautiful one! I undergo an indescribable state of pity along with my external sense-organs which could not attain you, but the mind is fortunate in that it is immersed in you without other avocations; strange is the fortune of the one among its own genre. Hit by the breeze coming forth shaking the water-lilies and dancing black bees I roll in the lake of agony every night, the world around being quiet at sleep the wailing Cakravāka-s keep company with me when I sigh in sorrow. Delusion has set in; courage merges with frigidity; madness reveals itself and the mind goes astray -all this is known only to Cupid who roams about me without food or sleep sending forth arrows. Beautiful creepers of the- vernal season flocked by the black bees and dancing at the kiss of the southern breeze remind me of your hands around shaking and producing inarticulate arrows. Beautiful creepers of the vernal season flocked by the black bees and dancing at the kiss of the southern breeze remind me of your hands around shaking and producing inarticulate sounds when I kissed you during the period of our enjoyment. Somehow I am tolerating the gentle breeze carrying the smell of Bakula flowers thinking all the while over your gait in the vicinity of the jewel window, with your locks spilled over the shoulders and hands holding the tip of your loin clothes. My mind longs for that Cakravāka youth who somehow passes the night rendered longer by the agony of separation and as the red rays of the sun appear on the eastern horizon who suddenly embraces the female approaching him in all haste.

At the slightest sound I raise my neck with a smile and I cast my eyes to the direction where you used to walk. I hold my limbs dear to me because of your touch and I hold my life since it is the dearest one to you. The feeling of mutual embrace is there since both of us live in the same earth, find pleasure in censuring Cupid in private and are bathed alike by the beams of moon at night. In this interlude of separation where mutual contact is impossible the flight of imagination is my sole consolation and with its co-operation time and again I have embraced you with love holding you in my lap-ah! the rest I leave untold. The heart has become a worthy target for Cupid to pierce and courage slips away through the many holes, and as the limbs wane in pace with the passing of time the heat of the fire of Cupid increases as also its brilliance. Even in such separation there is no dearth for expediences and I continue to live depending on them. O virtuous one ! abstaining from reckless acts you should not disregard the entreaties of the maids in respect of taking bath -and such other things. By the blessing of the Goddess Pārvatī, the ocean of separation is almost crossed and you bear the remaining couple of months taking cheer and on the scented balconies we shalt spend together the days crowded- with the fresh murmuring rain-clouds.

Does it come to your mind that once while bathing in the Cūrṇī with the flowers washed away from the locks, with white eyes and pure lips standing in waist-high water amidst your friends at the end of bath suddenly looking at me, and that both of us dipping again ? And seeing a young mango tree in the garden embracing a host of creepers with its boughs your turning around the face with quivering lips and casting the side-long glance with the drops of tears and the curve of the brows? Repulsed in a huff and reflected in your breasts, your maid unaware of the fact tried to conceal me by applying the sandal paste when the other friends smilingly interfered saying not to apply sandal on horripilated breasts wherein you looked abashed'? While gathering flowers from the garden with your tender hands standing beside me, who, as eager as the black bee wanted to drink the fragrance of your lotus-face, your clever friends closed their eyes sometime with their hands as though afraid of the pollen of flowers ?

From these means of recognition you know of my well-being. In addition you hear a unique incident: When seeing all supplication rejected the swan kept for pleasure kissed the groaning consort forcefully at which you bashfully looked at me recollecting to your mind something singular ! It is commonly agreed that the bond of love snaps in separation, but my love for you is hundredfold during separation than in union-a difference which is evident in another respect also wherein you appear single in union but while in separation all the three worlds merge in you."

Doing this favour to this forlorn brother, O Kokila you become the foremost among the merciful. Indeed you are called Parabhṛta-fostered by others, O! jewel among birds ! You be called by the same name now by supporting others. Thus sustaining her life afflicted by separation, O self-willed one ! You may go wherever you like and never there be any possibility of separation between you and your faithful consort, O venerable friend of -the king of Love.

THE ROUTE

In Sandeśakāvyas the description of the route assigned to the messenger forms the most important factor as far as the poet is concerned; the message being reduced to a means to the end of giving a geographical account of the various regions which are familiar to him. Another feature of this species of lyrics is that capitals, cities, temples, rivers and mountains form the pointer for the messenger. These common characteristics can be observed in the KS also.

The route preferred by Uddaṇḍa is a northern one as against the southern course described by Lakṣmīdāsa in his Śukasandeśa-an earlier work. The destination being almost very near to each other-Tṛkkaṇāmatilakam (Guṇakā) and Cennamangalam (Jayantamangalam)-both located in Cochin. These two together afford a complete account of Kerala.

Reference is made to the rivers like Kampā Kṣīrasindhu (Pālār), Kāverī, Nīvā-all in Tamilnad and Nilā: (Bhāratappuḻa), Vāṅmayī-(Vavalippuḻa) Cūrṇī (Periyār), Vallī (Vaḻḻiyār identified with Kaṭaluṇḍippuḻa) in Kerala.

The various regions through which the messenger is to pass by are: Kāñcī, Tuṇḍīra, Hosala (lying in Trichinapoly and Coimbatore districts), Coḻa-all in Tamilnad and Northern Kottayam (the capital of Puraḻi Kings), Kolam (or Kolattunāḍ), Kukkuṭakroḍa (Koḻikkoḍe or Calicut), Prakāśa (Veṭṭattunāḍ), Raṇakhaḻa (Porkkaḻam), Koṭuṅṅallūr, Añjanakhaḻa (Tiruvañcikkuḻam) alias Mahodayapuram, Vanneri and Jayantamaṅgalam (Cennamaṅgalam)-all in Kerala.

A number of temples and sacred spots are mentioned as lying on the course through which the messenger is to reach his destination. They are: Kāmākṣī temple at Kāñcī, Viṣṇu temple at Karigiri, Śiva temple at Vilvakṣetra, Viṣṇu temple at Lakṣmīnārāyaṇapuram Raṅganātha temple at Śrīraṅgam, Viṣṇu temple at Tirunelli, Śiva temple at Cerumannam, Mūkāmbi (Śri Porakkali) temple also in the proximity of Cerumannam, Śiva temple at Periñcellūr (Sampadgrāma), Kṛṣṇa temple at Sambara (Tṛccemmaram), Mṛtyuñjaya temple at Śvetāraṇya (Tṛppraṅgoḍ), Viṣṇu temple at Tirunāvā, Śāstā temple at Śambarakroḍa (Camravaṭṭam), Kātyāyanī temple at Muktipuri (Mukkola), Śiva temple at Vṛṣapurī-(Trichur), Ardhanārīśvara (alias Eraṭṭayappan) temple at Peruvanam, Durgā temple at Ūrakam, Viṣṇu temple at Saṃgamagrāma (Iriñjāḻakkuḍa) and Śiva temple at Añjanakhaḻa (Tiruvañcikkuḻam).

Festivals of Śrī Kāmākṣī temple in the month of Phālguna and the Mahāmāghasevā (popularly known as Māmāmkam) at Tiruñavā are also mentioned in this connection.

The only mountain lying in the route is the Sahya while the only ocean referred to being the Western ocean or Arabian Sea.

The inspiring descriptions of the various places reveal that the poet was familiar with those spots. He has also tried to bring out the cultural significance of the regions by referring to the famous poets and scholars of the locality. It is evident that our poet has widely travelled all over Kerala.

AN APPRECIATION

Though Vālmīkī has paved the way for a species of lyrics called Sandeśakāvyā-s by introducing the Hanumatsandeśa in his Rāmāyaṇa, it is Kāḷidāsa who really established it in Indian literature by composing his Meghasandeśa. The work was received with such an enthusiasm that attempts were made to emulate it in an all India level. Kerala is perhaps the only region which produced works of real merit in this field, some of them being good enough to be considered on a par with the first and foremost in the field.

Lakṣmīdāsa who lived at about 13th or 14th century A. D. composed his Śukasandeśa-the first of its kind written by a Keralite against his native background giving a good account of the region. The next in importance is the KS of Uddaṇḍa. It has already been pointed out that the route described in these two are different and that the two works together give a complete account of Kerala. It is more or less certain that Uddaṇḍa had read the earlier work and was influenced by it in various aspects. It is needless to say that the Meghasandeśa has also influenced the poet since it can be asserted that all later Sandeśakāvyās - are indebted to it in many respects, it being taken as a model. The KS was followed by a host of the Sandeśakāvyās like the Mayūradūta of Udaya, the Cakorasandeśa of Vāsudeva, the Subhagasandeśa of Nārāyaṇa etc. Among these there is one written in Prākṛt known as the Bhṛṅgasandeśa of anonymous authorship. All these together will help one to find valuable information on regional geography and cultural history of Kerala.

But none of these later works could outshine the earlier ones i.e., the Śukasandeśa and the KS. Koṭuṅṅallūr Koccuṇṇi Tampurān the author of the Viprasandeśa has mentioned these along with the Meghasandeśa of Kāḷidāsa, thus clubbing the three together.[83] It is to be admitted that 'his view is unbiased and just.

The KS has afforded an occasion for its author to exhibit his versatile talents in improvisation, versification, choice of words, range of vocabulary, delineation of sentiments, description of nature and employment of suggestion. While using figures of speech, both in sound and sense, he has taken particular care not to overdo it. The main sentiment of the work being Śṛṅgāra and its varieties, the author has succeeded in bringing out its all round charm. It is agreed on all hands that the work deserves an honoured place among a select band of its own genre.

THE EDITION

The KS was published for the first time in ME. 1078/AD. 1903 in Malayalam script along with a Malayalam translation by Koṭuṅṅallūr Kuṅṅikkuṭṭan Tampurān. It was edited by T. K. Krishna Menon and printed at the Keralakalpadrumam Press, Trichur. The edition is based on a single manuscript and contains several mistakes.

An edition in Devanagari script based on the earlier edition was published by Sri P. S. Anantanarayana Sastri in 1913 from the Mangalodayam Company, Trichur. It was subsequently reprinted in 1939. The learned editor has corrected some of the mistakes though he has admitted that he could not find any manuscript in support of his edition. The present edition is based on the following manuscript material :

Classification of Manuscripts : The available manuscripts represent two different classes in readings as well as in the number of verses. They may be grouped into A and B.

Group A: This group is represented by Manuscripts. C.O. 1626; 22628-B; 16770-A, D-1 1835 and T. 292. Of these T. 292 has no independent value since it is known to be a copy made from 16770 A. These show certain characteristics which are absent in the other group.

(i) The numbers of the verses are consecutive despite the work being divided into two sections viz-Pūrva and Uttara sandeśa-s.

(ii) The verse begining with 'Tatratyāstvām' (32) is peculiar to this group while in the other it is omitted.

(iii) The Pūravasandeśa contains 93 verses as against 92 in the other group.

(iv) All the manuscripts of this group omit the first half of the verse numbered 102. 'शृङ्गाराब्धिप्लव इव।।।।।।संश्लिष्य यत्र'। Consequently the verse 102 in these consists of the second half of 102 + first half of 103. This kind of mixing of two halves is followed till the verse numbered 139 apparently ignoring the difficulties arising in the construction of meaning.

Dr. Urmila Sharma Collection, Varanasi

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

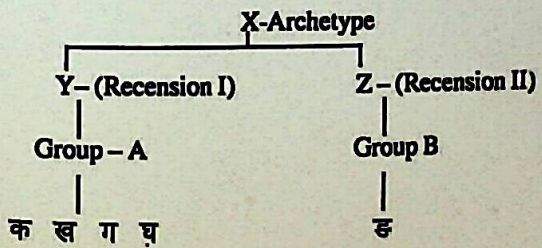
(v) The second line of the verse 141 viz-'कच्चित् क्षेमं भजति भवतीत्यात्तवाचं भवन्तं' is omitted in all the manuscripts of the group. As a result the verse numbered 140 of the group consists of the second half of the verse 140 of the present edition plus the first and third lines of the verse number 141. The verse 141 of the group consists of the last line of the verse 141 of this edition plus the first three lines of 42. The verse numbered 142 of the group consists only of three lines, obviously the second line being omitted. It consists of the last line of verse 142 of this edition plus the first two lines of 142 The omission is necessitated because of the omission of an earlier line in verse 141 begining with 'Coleṣvāste -'. From here onwards the intermixing of two halves is followed till the end. Thus the verse 161 of the group is a combination of the halves of verses:' 161 and 162. Consequently the last two lines of the work remain as a half verse ! Thus it may be seen that the group A forms a separate recension of the Archetype which is no more extant.

Group B: This group is now represented by the printed editions. The chief characteristic of the group is that it omits the verse numbered 32 of the present edition. The numbering of the verses is not consecutive throughout the text. The first part consists of 92 verses while the second part has 69 verses, altogether having only 161 verses. This group preserves some characteristic readings, so that it may be ascertained that the group represents a different recension of the Archetype. The original of the group is almost non-extant.

The classification can be diagramatically shown as follows:



Dr. Urmila Sharma Collection, Varanasi

Of these the Ms. marked ङ (2) is taken as the working basis of this edition, though it is treated with the same value assigned to other manuscripts.

Aknowledgements

The Mss. referred to as क, ख and ग are to be found in the collection of the Oriental Research Institute and Manuscripts Library of the Kerala University. Ms. I is a transcript supplied by the Curator of the Government Oriental Manuscripts Library, Madras. Since all the extant manuscripts show lacunae for inserting letters at a later time, it may be ascertained that they are only copies. Judging from the nature of the text, it must be admitted, that the available manuscript material is enough for a critical edition.

NOTES

Part I

1. The house of the heroine whence the hero is taken to Kāñcī is called Mārakkara at Cennamaṅgalam in Cochin. Kāñcī, one of the great cities of ancient India was the capital of several Pallava kings. It is looked upon by devotees as the Vārāṇasi of the South. Touching its southern boundary flows the river Kampā, generally identified with Vegavatī. Some hold that these two are different rivers and that Kampā is extinct now, being reduced to a holy tank found at the Ekāmranātha temple.

   Mr. P. S. Anantanarayana Sastri notes: अत्र रसानुगुण्यात् 'चित्रा देवी गति'रिति वाक्यगर्भितत्वं न दोषाय।

2. According to tradition there were 108 shrines dedicated to Śiva and 18 shrines dedicated to Viṣṇu in Kāñcī. Even at present there are quite a number of temples to be seen in that region. The most important among the shrines found there are—the temple of Ekāmranātha (Śiva), of Varadarāja (Viṣṇu), and of Kāmākṣi (Pārvatī), of which the first one is the most important. The reference in the verse is to the temples of Śiva and Kāmāksī.

3. It is said that God Brahman had chosen the place to perform a sacrifice. Goddess Pārvatī was also relieved of a curse by performing penance on the spot. Once, Pārvatī incurred the displeasure of Śiva by closing his eyes from behind by her palms while he was engaged in his sacred duties of creation, sustenance and destruction. She was summarily punished with a curse for her silly act. Later, Śiva having relented asked her to go to the temple dedicated to Ekāmranātha where she is to perform penance for six months in order to be relieved of the curse. Hence the spot is referred to as holy one capable of destroying obstacles.

4. Mr. Sastri remarks : पद्यमिदं 'तस्मिन्नद्रा'विति मेघसन्देशपद्यच्छायामनुसरतीव।

5. The fourth line of the verse betrays similarity with the following line of Śukasandeśa, an earlier work: शुकमिति गिरा श्राव्यया सन्दिदेश।

7. Here again one is reminded of the Meghasandeśa line: प्रकृतिपुरुषं कामरूपं मघोनः।

10. The third line of the verse has obvious resemblance with the Meghasandeśa line: कान्तोदन्तः सुहृदुपनतः सङ्गमात्किञ्चिदूनः।

11. Jayantamaṅgalam better known to Keralites as Cennamaṅgalam lies within the two arms of the Alwaye river which forms the part of the Cūrṇī or Periyār. The place is constituted as the destination of the messenger in his errand. The shrine referred to here is probably the Narasimha temple situated on the banks of the river.

12. The heroine is a lady of the Mārakkara house in Cennamaṅgalam. She is said to have been a Nair lady who in all probability was the consort of the poet.

14. Festival in the Kāmākṣī temple at Kāñcī falls in the month of Phālguna. It is supposed to occur at the end of the six month period during which Pārvatī performed a penance to expiate herself from the curse pronounced by her husband. On the tenth and final day of the festival the idols of Śiva and Pārvatī are placed side by side at night. The western ocean referred to here is the Arabian sea.

16. Karigiri also known as Hastigiri—a hillock, is located near Kāñcī. There is the temple of Viṣṇu called Karigirivarada on a hillock having a height of over 30 feet. It is said that god Brahman had performed a sacrifice on the spot in the distant past. The figure employed in the last line of the verse hints at the traditional story.

17. It is Śaṅkara the great philosopher who consecrated goddess Kāmākṣī, by whose blessing many became great poets. Śaṅkara himself has stated in his Saundaryalaharī (verse 75) that a South Indian poet Dramiḍaśiśu identified by some with Tirujñānsambandhar has become a poet on account of the blessing of the deity. Anyway the place has been a centre of learning down the centuries.

18. There was a mango tree in the precincts of the Ekāmrānatha temple which was considered as the personification of all the Śastras. Traditionally it is believed that the tree used to supply one mango fruit each day to be offered to the god. Hence the spot is considered to be dear to the deity.

20. The word Kāñcī here refers to the region as well as to the loins, Mr. Sastri remarks: तत्सौन्दर्यापहृतहृदयो मा विलम्बस्वे'ति वचनं, ज्ञातास्वादो विवृतजघनां को विहातुं समर्थ, इत्यस्य स्मारयति।

21. The term Kṣirasindhu is the Sanskritised form of Pālār. The river springs from the Nandi hills in Mysore and flows through Mysore, North Arcot and Chingleput and falls into the bay of Bengal.

Mr. Sastri suggests the following reading for the fourth line : तरुणासेवितामित्येव हृद्यतरः पाठः. It is not supported by any manuscript.

Dr. Urmila Sharma Collection, Varanasi

CC0. In Public Domain, Digitizagtion by eGangotri

25. The Brahmin settlement referred to here is Lāṭapuram the native place of the poet. It is on the banks of the river Pālār and a few miles away from Kāñcī.

26. That the place is a centre of learning as well as the abode of learned Brahmins proficient in Vedic lore is made out by the verse.

27. Vilvakṣetra, a temple dedicated to Śiva is located on the banks of the river Nīvā.

32. The verse is omitted by Mr. Sastri though all the extant manuscripts contain it.

35. The river Kāverī springs from the Kuṭaku hills and flows through Mysore, Salem, Coimbatore, Trichinapoly and Tanjore before falling into the bay of Bengal. The Raṅganātha temple of Śrīraṅgam is situated in an island surrounded by the waters of Kāverī.

36. Hosalas - the region probably consisted of the modern Trichinapoly and Coimbatore districts. The temple dedicated to Murāri is referred to here.

39. Paraśurāma the leader of the Bhārgavas is said to have crushed the Kṣatriya kings on twentyone occasions depriving them of their countries. Having relented from the slaughter he reached the Sahya mount for performing penance.

41. Āmalakadharaṇī is the Sanskritised form of Tirunelli where the temple consecrated to Viṣṇu is located. Kerala is known as the Bhārgavakṣetra. Various works like the Keralotpatti and Keralamāhātmyam narrate how Paraśurāma reclaimed the land from the Arabian sea throwing his battle axe from Gokarṇa to Kanyākumarī.

42. The river Vāṉmayī is identified with Vāvalippuḷa near Koṭṭiyūr in North Malabar. The temple of Śiva referred to here is identified with the Cerumannam shrine. The name is variously derived from Tṟiṭaṭakkunnu, Tṟcceramaṇṇu etc. It is said that Śiva created Vīrabhadra from his matted locks to kill Dakṣa on his own sacrificial ground. The god here is supposed to represent this attitude. The goddess Bhadrakāḷī mentioned here is Śrī Porkkali of Mūkāmbi temple which is located a few miles away from the Śivā temple.

44 The second line of the verse betrays semblance with the Meghsandeśa line; 'खिन्न: खिन्न: शिखरिषु पदं न्यस्य।

45. Koṭṭayam in North Malabar was the capital of Puraḷi kings at the time of the poet. According to tradition the kings of the royal line—especially king Hariścandra—propagated the Mīmāmsa philosophy propounded by Kumārilabhaṭṭa the author of Tantravārttika. Purali is the name of the hill where the kings established their capital. The tutelary deity of the line is Caṇḍikā also called Śrī Porkali often eulogised in the literary works of Koṭṭayam kings.

47. The Svātī princess referred to in the verse is likely to be the lady extolled in the Svātīmuktaka variously known as Svātīpraśamsā, Svātīcāṭu etc. The authorship of the work is wrongly attributed to our poet though there is no conclusive evidence to support the hypothesis.

50. Sampadgrāma is to be identified with Periñcellūr in Talipparamba. The famous Śiva temple of the region is extolled in numerous legends and literary works. It was one of the opulent villages of ancient Kerala. It is believed that Śrī Rāma had once visited the temple and worshipped there. Comparison of the verse with the following Meghasandeśa lines is obvious: वक्रः पन्था यदपि भवतः प्रस्थितस्योत्तराशाम्।

51. It is said that Brahmins do not prostrate in salutation in the Maṇḍapa of the temple since Rāma—a Kṣatriya had once prostrated there. Hence the Brahmins are spoken of as saluting in prostration in the corridors of the temple.

52. Mr. Sastri notes: विष्किराणामुद्गतः = पक्षिणामुपरिस्थितः। कण्ठच्छायेत्यादि वर्णनं 'भर्तुः कण्ठच्छवि'रिति कालिदासभणितिमनुबोधयति।

53. Mr. Sastri suggests: इदं पद्यं 'एकैश्वर्ये स्थितेऽपी'ति कालिदासीयपद्यच्छायामाश्रयति।

61. Śambara is the Sanskritised form of Cemmara or Tṛccemmara famous for the Kṛṣṇa temple located to the southeast of Talipparamba. Kolattunāḍ is the region which was once ruled over by the Mūṣaka kings. The poet Śaṅkara referred to here is the author of the Sanskrit kāvya Śrīkṛṣṇavijaya and a contemporary.

62. The traditional story that mountains had wings and that they plunged into the sea for fear of the thunderbolt of Indra who tried to cut their wings is alluded to here.

64. Kukkuḍakroḍa is the Sanskritisation for Koḻikkoḍe (Calicut) the famous seat of the Zamorins in whose court our poet flourished. The term 'śikharijaladhiswāmī' is the Sanskritisation for the Malayalam word 'Kunnalakkon' meaning the lord of the hill and sea. Another popular term is 'śailābdhiśvara' which is also used by our poet in one of the muktakas.

67. The prosperity of Calicut at the time of our poet is brought out in the verse. Mr. Sastri notes: बहुभार्यस्यापि तस्य कन्या परमेकैवेति वात्सल्यातिशये हेतुः।

69. Mr. Sastri suggests : निधानादिति पाठो हृदयङ्गमः. But none of the manuscripts contains the reading.

70. Prakāśa stands for Veṭṭattunāḍ which forms a part of the Ponnani taluk. The temple referred to here is the one consecrated to Mṛtyuñjaya (Śiva) who had overcome the god of Death in saving his devotee Mārkaṇḍeya. The seat of the temple is called Śvetāraṇya or Tṛpparakroḍa, Tṛpparaṅgoḍ etc.

72. The river Niḷā is to be identified with Bhāratappuḷa the longest river which falls into the Arabian sea. On its northern bank is situated the Viṣṇu temple of Tirunāvā.

73. The Mahāmāgha festival popularly known as Māmānkam is celebrated once in twelve years. The festival which was started from very ancient time is now extinct, the last one having been held in 1743 A. D. Usually it was attended by a large gathering coming from all parts of the land. The Zamorins of Calicut were the patrons of the festival and the rulers of Vaḷḷuvanāḍ used to challenge their position by sending a specially trained battalion whose duty was to kill the Zamorin and were invariably killed in the altercation. The members of this suicide-squad were given certain privileges which were normally conferred on them posthumously.

Mr. Sastri remarks: पद्ममिति पाठे नाप्रयुक्तत्वदोषशङ्का।

75. The Śāstā temple at Camravaṭṭam (Śambarakroḍa) is on the banks of Bhāratappuḷa near Ponnani. When the river is in spate the temple is almost immersed in the flood. It is observed time and again that not a single tile is washed away from the temple. Those who pass over the region usually offer worship to the god. The poet has obviously emulated the Śukasandeśa verse ending with: कुर्वन्नात्मक्षममुपहृतौ प्रीतये हि प्रभूणाम्। Mr. Sastri points out that: संचरतेरात्मनेपदं चिन्त्यम्।

76. Vaḷiyār identified with Kaṭaluṇḍippuḷa springs from Nilagiri hills and falls into the Arabian sea somewhere near Beypur. The river Kauṇi is identified with Kumāranellūr river.

77. The region referred to here is called Vanneri to the south of Ponnani. Netranārāyaṇa is the title of Āḷvāñceri Tamprākkal who performs the coronation ceremony of the rulers of the Cochin royal line.

78. The shrine mentioned here is the famous temple of Mukkola, Sanskritised as Muktipuryālaya. Mr. Sastri observes: पद्म इति पुल्लिङ्गप्रयोगः अप्रयुक्तत्वदोषग्रस्तः। अथवा महाकवेरस्य प्रयोगात्तस्याप्रयुक्तत्वदोषोदाहरणता विलयं गच्छतु।

79. Porkkaḷam Sanskritised as Raṇakhaḷa is the village in which the house of the famous Payyūrbhaṭṭas is located.

81. The verse contains a veiled reference to the work itself. It is suggested that the poet would like to show his composition to the famous Maharṣi himself out of respect for the Kerala scholar.

82. Vṛṣapurī is the modern Trichur, famous for the Śiva temple.

83. The place is known as Perumanam or Peruvanam. It is also referred to as Puruvanam because of its alleged connection with the ancient sage Puru. There is the Ardhanārīśvara temple the deity of which is popularly called Eraṭṭayappan meaning the twin-god.

85. To the north of Iriñjālakkuḍa there is a temple dedicated to goddess Durgā known as Valayādhīśvarī on whom our poet has composed a verse.

86. Samgamagrāma is Iriñjālakkuḍa. The deity of the shrine is referred to here as Viṣṇu, though according to modern belief it is Bharata who is consecrated in the temple.

87. The temple mentioned here is the one consecrated to Bhadrakāḷi at Koḍuṅgallūr. It is well known through out Kerala.

89. Añjanakhaḷa (Tiruvañcikkuḷam) is identified with Mahodayapuram, the ancient capital of Kerala. Cūṛṇī is the Periyār. The word Śaṅkara stands for the local deity.

Mr. Sastri notes: चूर्णी नाम सरित्। यस्यास्तीरे कृतावतारा श्रीशङ्कराचार्यपूज्यपादाः।

92. The prosperity of Cennamaṅgalam is hinted at in the verse under reference.

Part II

1. According to Mr. Sastri the verse also contains a veiled reference to the Villārvaṭṭam royal family of Cochin. He notes: जन्मक्षितिमिति पाठो हृद्यतरः।

12. The poet gives a fanciful derivation of the housename Mārakkara belonging to the heroine. Mr. Sastri notes: महाभागशब्दात् ष्यञि 'हृद्भगसिन्ध्वन्ते पूर्वपदस्य च' इत्युभयपदवृद्धिः।

13. Mr. Sastri points out the resemblance of the verse with the Meghasandeśa line : 'वापी चास्मिन्।

16. Mr. Sastri remarks: वलतेः परस्मैपदं कवयितुः स्वातन्त्र्यात्। वलत इत्येव वा पाठः।

26. Mr. Sastri observes: कर्णजाहे = कर्णमूले। 'तस्य पाकमूले पील्वा दिकर्णादिभ्यः कुणब्जाहचौ' इतिं जाहच्य।

33. Mr. Sastri notes: शोच्या च प्रियदर्शना च मदनक्लिष्टेयमालक्ष्यत' इति कविशिखामणिः thus bringing out the similarity of the verse with the Śākuntala verse.

38. Mr. Sastri points out: वेति तमिति पाठः अशुद्ध इव प्रतिभाति। सहृदयाः परमत्र प्रमाणम्. But all the extant manuscripts contain the same reading.

44. Mr. Sastri observes as follows: अत्र पूर्वार्द्धे यः पूरा धूयतेस्मेत्येव पाठः समीचिनो भाति। विपश्चितो निश्चिन्वन्तु वस्तुतत्वम्. But it is not supported by any manuscript.

53. Mr. Sastri notes : स्वनदिति वा पाठः।

56. Mr. Sastri remarks : मुग्धहंसी निनाद इति पाठो हृद्यतरो भासते. The reading is accepted by the present editor since it is supported by manuscripts.

KOKILASANDEŚA

Ed. Dr. N. P. UNNI

Though Vālmīki has paved the way for a species of lyrics called Sandeśakāvyas by introducing the Hanumatsandeśa in his Rāmāyaṇa, it is Kālidāsa who really established it in Indian literature by composing his Meghasandeśa. The work was received with such an enthusiasm that attempts were made to emulate it at an all India level. Kerala is perhaps the only region which produced works of real merit in this field, some of them coming very near the 'model' in quality and form.

Kokilasandeśa, a beautiful lyric in 162 verses, is one of the best Sandeśakāvyas produced in Kerala. The work affords an occasion to the author to describe various places of interest like cities, shrines, rivers, centres of cultural interest and to refer to various celebrities of the age. The work deserves an honoured place among a select band of its own genre.
